Neither belligerent would have any cause to complain if we refused to allow our citizens to travel on armed ships. In fact, as a neutral Nation, I am inclined to the opinion it is our duty to refuse such ships clearance from our ports. I grant you that if there were no submarines in the world this situation would not be so acute, though with the class of guns now mounted on some foreign merchantmen, used as they claim the right to use them, the situation would involve great danger in the use of lightly armed cruisers. The craft that makes the trouble, however, is the submarine. Our proper contention is that the submarine must halt, search, remove passengers and crew to a place of safety before destroying a merchant ship. On the other hand, the President's contention seems to be that merchant ships must be allowed to arm, and that contention made now necessarily applies to merchant ships as now armed. Therefore the contention is that a merchant ship armed to repel a submarine, or sink it, and ordered to do so if overhauled, shall be allowed to sail the seas, entitled to the rights and immunities of a peaceful, unresisting ship. In its final analysis that means that submarines could not be used against ships so armed without grave danger, without almost a certainty of destroying life and thus, if neutral passengers were aboard, threatening new complications, and the extension and enlargement of the theater of war. The position which the President now takes therefore virtually bars the submarine from action against merchant ships.

What is it the President said about changing the rules during the progress of the war? Heretofore the administration has made some of the most remarkable changes known to political history. But this proposal to change the rule with regard to submarines is the most remarkable of all in the history of the administration. For if the right of the submarine to operate against and sink merchantmen has been fixed and is accepted, as it seems to be, that fact is due to the attitude of the President, assuming the State Department reflects his attitude, and by the acts and words of our State Department, more than by all other influences combined. On January 18 Secretary Lansing, in the note I have referred to, said, "I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines." And yet overnight the President reverses his rule, abandons the principle which he himself has declared, if it can be called a principle, and with flourish of trumpets announces in effect an entirely new rule, to wit: That submarines may not be used against merchantmen, and this, with the ink hardly dry on the suggestion of our State Department that owing to the acknowledged right to use submarines, the claim of the right of merchantmen to arm is presented in a new and dubious light.

We hope for peace, but some day unhappily war may come. If it does, we must rely largely on the submarine, and we would find ourselves sadly handicapped if we acknowledged a rule under which any merchantman might stand off our submarines with mounted guns, preventing use of the weapons of the submarine for fear of injuring passengers or crew. [Applause.]

I am not surprised that this sudden change of front on the part of the administration is applauded in certain influential quarters. It has been apparent for some time that certain influences, working for great military and naval establishments, are not averse to having the country brought into complications if thereby their propaganda may be promoted and strengthened. As the slimy film of Standard Oil smeared our policy in Mexico, so the interests of munition makers and foreign bondholders are now voiced by a thousand serviceable tongues. With what force and volume half a billion of foreign bond investments speak and the roar of an equal volume of munitions profits and expectations may be likened to the thunder of the attack and defense of Verdun. Some time since it was claimed and asserted that some of foreign birth or parentage had so far forgotten their primary allegiance to America as to attempt "to debase our policies to the uses of foreign intrigue." Be that as it may, it is now patent to anyone with ears and attentive to the talk around him that there are those who applaud the letter and attitude of the President out of their intense and, as I believe, unpatriotic partisanship for one of the contending alliances. Unhappily there are those who speak this partisanship openly, to our reproach and discredit as a neutral people, friendly to all the nations and peoples now unhappily engaged in deadly combat.

But the great heart of America still beats true to our faith and duty as a truly neutral power. As our people have not and can not approve, but do condemn most severely every act of ruthlessness or barbarity on the part of any of the contending forces or nations, as they have and will insist on the assertion and defense of all American rights, even so they will not allow anyone, however high his station, to lead the Nation into the perils of conflict by the assertion of or insistence upon fancied or fantastic rights.

Congress is still the representative of the people, and in the final show-down responsible for the issues of peace and war. Congress will not abdicate its powers or responsibilities, though it will patiently and loyally endeavor to support the administration when the administration faithfully adheres to the path of good judgment and sound discretion. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP].

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, twice has this bill been before Congress during my brief service. Twice have I voted against it and opposed it, and twice have I voted against passing this bill over the veto of two Presidents, one a Republican and one a Democrat.

No changes have taken place since which would compel me to change my view on this bill, and I am opposed to it now. If anything, conditions have arisen which, to my mind, present less reason for the enactment of this legislation. The war in Europe has decreased immigration to such a great extent that certainly no reason exists for passing this bill now.

Mr. Chairman, I opposed a similar bill in the last Congress for the reason that it contained a provision for the exclusion of all aliens over 16 years of age who could not read some language. The same provision which caused me to oppose that bill in the last Congress appears in this bill, beginning at the top of page 8.

I am in favor of keeping out undesirable immigrants. I am in favor of keeping out the criminal, the insane, and mentally defective, the diseased and morally unfit, the pauper, and those incapable of earning a living; but I can not support a provision in a bill which would keep out of this country a sane, healthy, moral, honest, and upright man for the reason that he can not read a few lines of some language.

Section 2 of the present immigration law, the law now on our statute books, provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; professional beggars; persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all government, or of all forms of law, or the assassination of public officials; prostitutes, or women or girls coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons hereinafter called contract laborers who have been induced or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, expressed or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; those who have been, within one year from the date of application for admission to the United States, deported as having been induced or solicited to migrate as above described; any person whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes and that said ticket or passage was not paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; all children under 16 years of age unaccompanied by one or both of their parents, at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or under such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude: Provided further, That the provisions of this section relating to the payments for tickets or passage by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government shall not apply to the tickets or passage of aliens in immediate and continuous transit through the United States to foreign contiguous territory: And provided further, That skilled labor may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country: And provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants.

Is there any doubt in the mind of any man that section 2 of the present law, if properly enforced, will not keep out the undesirable immigrant? The enforcement of this section of the law will keep out all immigrants we do not want.

Mr. Chairman, the literacy test provided in this bill is to my mind so silly, so unreasonable, so unjust, and so repugnant to American traditions that I can not support a bill that provides such a test. Are we to say that illiteracy is a crime or a badge of crime? Never anywhere, except here, have I heard it argued that inability to read some language is a sign of ignorance, bad character, or bad morals. Just because a man can not read is no proof that he is a bad man. Illiteracy is not a badge of bad character, nor is illiteracy ignorance. Illiteracy is a misfortune and any law that places a penalty on a person who has been so unfortunate as to be in such surroundings where he could not obtain an education is wrong and unjustly discriminatory.

Let me quote to you what Judge Goodwin, of Chicago, who has heard some 10,000 naturalization cases, says of the literacy test. This statement was made before the Committee on Immigration last month:

The supporters of the literacy test laid great emphasis on the desirability of excluding people from Sicily and other southern countries. Let me say that in my belief those people, and particularly the more undesirable elements among them, will have no difficulty in getting over such a literacy hurdle as you propose, while people from countries which admittedly now furnish our most desirable immigrants would find it a matter of great difficulty. Furthermore literacy does not depend on character or worth, but on opportunity. As a test of desirability it is ridiculous. It can only be supported logically by those who wish to exclude as many as possible, and who do not care much whether they exclude the fit or the unfit. It does not seem to me that the man's literary accomplishment has anything more to do with his qualification to make a good citizen than the color of his hair—far less, because it is very hard to disguise the natural color of your hair, but you can, in a very short time, pass such a literacy test as is suggested here.

Mr. Chairman, for over a century our country has been heralded as the asylum for the oppressed of every land. For over a century we have maintained an open-door policy. Immigrants have been coming to our shores singing the hymns of their native lands, and to-day they or their posterity are singing "My Country 'Tis of Thee." These men who came have builded homes; they have cleared the forests; they have plowed up our prairies; they have made our cities vast hives of industry, and when the very existence of our country was at stake our foreign-born population loyally responded to the call to save the Union. Thousands of them gave up their lives that this Nation might live. No literacy test was applied to them. When they responded to the call of duty no one tested them as to whether or not they could read.

Mr. Chairman, it is the claim of the proponents of this bill that it will keep out the undersirable immigrant. I do not know what is meant by the term "undesirable immigrant." Is it contended for one moment that an undesirable immigrant is the one who can not read a few lines of some foreign language? Will the fact that an immigrant can read a few lines of a language foreign to our own make him desirable? I can not believe it. The more you analyze this literacy test the more ridiculous it appears. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I contend that a man who can pass your literacy test and can use his ability to read and write for bad and dangerous purposes, is a much more undesirable immigrant than a man who can not read and comes here willing to work to better his condition. The dangerous man is the one who can write a blackhand letter, plan a crime, and such a man can pass your literacy test at any time. Let me quote to you what the Hon. Bourke Cockran, once a Member of this House, said before the Committee on Immigration on January 21, 1916, on the phase of the question:

Mr. Chairman, again the question occurs: What is it that constitutes a desirable immigrant? Is it the capacity to read or the capacity to work? Is the evidence of desirability a calloused hand which shows familiarity with labor or a fluent tongue, even if it shows some familiarity with letters? These men and women who had lived in the conditions which I have described have all been compelled to work, not merely hard, but desperately, to support their existence. Every one of them will show by his hands and muscles that he is qualified to work by long familiarity with it. He can not live except by industry. He has not sufficient instruction to make him a dangerous character. The really dangerous man is the one who could meet the literacy test triumphantly, the one who could read and write, but who perverts his abilities to formulating dangerous or vicious tendencies among other men. The illiterate man who works may on pay day get into trouble with the policeman through exuberance of spirits, caused by the quality of spirits he has imbibed. He may be troublesome, but he is not dangerous. The fine which he pays has been produced by his labor. The dangerous man is the one who can plan a forgery or burglary or other serious offense against our law, and that man can pass any literacy test that you can impose.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KONOP. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the gentleman think that while aliens are in the old country fighting for their flags it is a good time to get busy here?

Mr. KONOP. I do not think so. No aliens are coming in now. Let us wait and see whether they do come in after the war is over. There may not be any to come at all.

Another proposition that I want to submit about the literacy test is this: Will not a man who is unable to read or write some foreign language sooner learn to read and write our language than the man who can read some foreign language? The man who comes here knowing how to read some language foreign to our own will not need to read our language to inform himself of current events. He will read the newspapers of his own language to inform himself. While the man who comes here unable to read will of necessity sooner learn to read our language. "Necessity is the mother of invention." Necessity will lead the illiterate immigrant to learn the English language.

On this proposition let me quote what Judge Goodwin and Hon. Bourke Cockran told the committee.

Judge Goodwin said:

I do not think that literacy on the part of the immigrants necessarily leads to an early knowledge of the English language. I rather think that the contrary is true. He is more content to settle down to his own language, his own customs, and his own newspapers if he has a knowledge of a foreign language. That makes him still more alien, perhaps, than as though he came here with no literacy accomplishments.

Hon. Bourke Cockran said:

The man who comes here without capacity to read a newspaper printed in his own tongue must learn our language or remain in isolation without information of current events. The one who comes here with sufficient knowledge to enlighten himself through the papers published in his own language is not under the same necessity to acquire our language as the man who must learn it if he is to learn anything of what is going on around him.

Mr. Chairman, I spoke against this bill in the last Congress, and I want to restate what I said then in opposition to this bill. The proposition to prescribe a literacy test to the immigrant is, to my mind, nothing short of an insult to the immigrant of our earlier history. What is being said of the present-day immigrant was said of the immigrant of the forties, fifties, and seventies. We know all these pilgrims of those times. We are their descendants, and we worship them.

It is claimed that the laboring men of this country want this bill. It has also been claimed that the farmers want it. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the great mass of laboring men and farmers want this bill. Who are the laboring men and farmers of this country? They are all of the foreign stock. By far the largest number of them are sons of immigrants, and many of them are immigrants themselves. Are they so unjust that they would now deny their kinsfolk to come and dwell among them? Mr. Chairman, I can not believe it.

Right in this connection let me say that every Member of Congress has been flooded with letters from the officers of labor organizations, asking them to support this bill. When did the great mass of laborers of this country express themselves upon this proposition? Never! There never was a referendum upon this proposition. Why, this matter has not even been submitted to the union meetings. Under date of February 10, 1916, the secretary of the American Federation of Labor sent a circular letter to the local secretaries urging them to write letters to Senators and Congressmen urging them to vote for the Burnett immigration bill. Let me quote to you a paragraph from that letter:

Do not wait for your union meeting, but secure as many letters as is possible from individual members and other citizens to your two Senators and your Congressman. Urge your two Senators and Congressman to vote for the Burnett immigration bill, and when the bill is passed to vote to pass it over the President's veto, if he should again veto it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KONOP. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman does not mean to infer that the various labor organizations have not at some time taken up this proposition?

Mr. KONOP. They might have held meetings and have considered this proposition, and I know that the great American Federation of Labor in convention assembled voted to support this immigration bill; but I say, and I repeat it again, that this is a great departure from our great American open-door policy, a policy that has been so beneficial to our country, so beneficial to the progress and prosperity of our country, and this matter was never submitted on a referendum to the great mass of the laboring men of the country, and that at these conventions it was the men from above who have urged the delegates to vote for and support this proposition.

It is this letter of the secretary of the American Federation of Labor to which I have referred that has prompted the many letters that Members have received.

Mr. Chairman, I have answered as many of these letters as possible, frankly stating my position on this bill, giving my reasons for being unable to support it. I must say it is to the credit of the officers of the different branches of the grand organization of the American Federation of Labor that out of the many officers only one has tried to cajole and bully me into doing what my conscience told me was wrong, and that was A. E. Barker, of Detroit, grand president International Brotherhood of Maintenance-of-Way Employees. Let me insert the threatening and bullying letter of this man:

DETROIT, MICH., February 21, 1916.

Mr. THOMAS F. KONOP,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 19th instant in reply to mine of the 15th.

Permit me to thank you for having been very frank in expressing your views and stating your position regarding the bill. I have the greatest admiration for a man who has the courage of his convictions and you certainly have left no room for doubt as to your attitude toward the bill.

I have no desire to enter into any discussion as to the merits of the Burnett bill, nor to waste any time in answering your flimsy excuses for not supporting the measure, realizing fully that anything I might say or do would not carry any weight with you. I may say, however, that you may expect to hear from us a little later on, but in another and perhaps more effective way.

Yours, very truly,

A. E. BARKER,
Grand President International Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees.

I will now quote from my reply to Mr. Barker on what I thought about his threat. This speaks for itself:

The last sentence of your letter is as follows:

"I may say, however, that you may expect to hear from us a little later on, but in another and perhaps more effective way."

You make a threat! You mean to blackmail, of course! And you talk about keeping out the undesirable immigrant! I wish to state to you that you can not stampede nor bully me into doing something which I believe to be wrong, unjust, and un-American, and in spite of your threats I will act and do what I think is for the best interests of my country.

In my five years of service in the House of Representatives I have endeavored to uphold organized labor and work for its best interests. The great mass of laboring men in my district have approved of my course on this measure, as well as many others, and I leave my record to them, knowing that they will judge it fairly and honestly.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS F. KONOP.

Mr. Chairman, the main argument that is presented in favor of this bill is that immigration competes with American labor, that it lowers wages and in that way lowers the American standard of living. Immigration in general is charged with all the ills of our industrial system. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is an assertion without any proof whatever.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KONOP. I have only a few minutes, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman has just said that immigration is charged with all the ills. I think the matter of the tariff has generally been discussed as the basis of all economic ills in this country.

Mr. KONOP. Everything has been laid at the door of the immigrant. I want to prove to you that the immigrants do not come here to compete and do not compete with American labor.

In spite of the fact that there has been a steady increase of immigrants in the last 30 years, the American standard of living has not been lowered, but advanced, and it is higher to-day than it has ever been before. Wages, too, are higher to-day than ever before. The immigrant who comes here does not come here to compete with the skilled American laborer. He comes here to perform the work of the unskilled laborer. He does the unskilled work in the mines, in the quarries, on the railroad, on the farm, and in the forests. Native Americans and the older immigrants are the skilled laborers and the present-day immigrants become the unskilled laborers. It is undoubtedly true that unskilled labor is cheaper than the skilled labor. The present-day immigrant is the unskilled laborer, and it is true that the standard of living among the unskilled laborer is lower. Such a condition has always existed and will always exist. It is a part of our industrial system. No man would expect that the unskilled laborer would live in as fine a house as the skilled laborer or as the business man lives in. Nor would you expect his home located where the property is higher.

We have unskilled work to do. The native American and the earlier immigrant will not perform unskilled labor, and the present-day immigrant who performs unskilled labor is absolutely necessary to advance us in industry. It is a self-evident truth that no man can exercise any labor, however low it may be, without creating opportunity for the labor of other men. No man ever injures labor by working. It is an economic truth that the man who works creates work for others. The man who digs the coal out of the earth and brings it to the surface produces work for many skilled men. He makes work for the men who have charge of the complex machinery of its distribution. He creates work for the builder of locomotives, cars, and rails. He creates work for the men who operate the trains. He creates work for the clerks in the offices. He creates work for the driver who delivers it to the consumer and for the man who feeds it to the furnace. The man who works in the quarry creates work for many skilled men who take charge of his stone and place it in the building. The man who cuts down trees and saws them into logs produces work for the skilled laborer in the sawmill and planing mill and for the carpenter who builds the home. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the economic truth: "The man who works produces work for others."

There is another self-evident economic truth, and that is this: That the man who comes here is not only a worker and a producer, but he becomes immediately a consumer. Many of the immigrants come here with large families. These families need food, clothing, and shelter. They are consumers, and therefore create opportunities for work for others. The man who and whose family consumes clothing and shoes produces work for the maker of clothing and shoes. The man who needs houses consumes the lumber that other labor must prepare. The man who comes here to work can never become a competitor of labor but necessarily creates labor for others. [Applause.]

It is claimed that the immigrant is detrimental to the organization of labor. The statistics of the Immigration Commission show, however, that unions are as strong among foreign born as among native Americans. The following shows percentages of different classes of labor organized. This table is taken from Senate Document No. 696, Sixty-second Congress, second session:

Organization of native and immigrant labor.

Class.	Percentage organized.
Native born of native father:
White	13.9
Negro	17.9
Native born of foreign father	14.1
Foreign born	13.4

Another argument presented here in favor of the application of the reading test is that there is too much immigration and it should be restricted. Mr. Chairman, this is an assertion without any proof. In spite of this cry of too much immigration, the ratio between foreign born and native born in the last half of a century is practically the same. Who will claim that there was too much immigration from 1850 to 1860 or from 1860 to 1870? And yet census statistics show that the percentage of foreign born and native born has not changed. The following table is taken from page 788, volume 1, on population, census 1910:

Class.	Per cent distribution of total population of United States.
	1910	1900	1890	1880	1870	1860	1850
Native	85.3	86.4	85.3	86.7	85.6	86.8	90.3
Total foreign born	14.7	13.6	14.7	13.3	14.4	13.2	9.7
Total population	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0

It is also argued that the present-day immigrant comes from a source out of harmony with the spirit of American institutions, and hence not readily assimilable on that account. The same argument was used against the old immigrants, who are now so lauded as being better than the present-day immigrant. The same narrow argument was used by those who opposed immigration in the first half of the nineteenth century. And now we find those who were so condemned then lauded to the skies. But, Mr. Speaker, do they who say that the present-day immigrant is not readily assimilable, mean to argue that those immigrants who belong to these unassimilable races, who can read a page or two in their own language, will, because of that test, become readily assimilable? Such a test will not keep out the undesirable ones.

But is it true that the immigrants of to-day can not be assimilated? Whence comes these immigrants who are so different than we? Are we really not of their blood? The Italian immigrant is the one especially attacked. Mr. Speaker, a people who have builded the greatest empire of antiquity; a people whose civilization lighted the whole known world and who discovered the new; a people to whom we go for the best in literature, in art, and in government. Such people ought to be welcomed to our shores. Will anyone claim that a race that has produced a Boccaccio, a Dante, a Michelangelo, a Columbus, a Cabot, and a Caruso can not be assimilated?

Another people against whom a stigma is cast, and against whom this bill is aimed, are the Polish people. The Polish people are the most unfortunate people of Europe. To-day their land is drenched with blood. Their cities and homes have been razed to the ground. They are a people without a country; a race without a home. The story of their struggle for liberty touches the heart of liberty-loving people everywhere. They have been robbed of their country. Educational facilities have been denied them, and if you pass this bill 35 per cent of these people will be rejected. Thousands of these people have settled in my district and in my State. They are an industrious, hard-working, and liberty-loving people. They are a home people. They have cleared away the forest, built up nice homes, reared up large families, and many of their descendants are among the most prominent citizens of our State. Wisconsin can not get along without them.

Mr. Chairman, when Kosciusko and Pulaski appeared at our shores and offered their services for the cause of liberty and independence no one asked them, "Can you read?" One of these Polish patriots gave up his life for the cause of independence. If the Father of this Republic could cast his eyes on a scene being enacted here against a people whence his aids, Kosciusko and Pulaski sprang, he would condemn this bill.

If you pass this bill nearly 30 per cent of the Jews will be excluded. For centuries the Jew has been a wanderer on the face of the earth. Persecuted everywhere, he has outlived all. He is the pilgrim of eternity. This country has been his asylum. A race, under the most adverse circumstances, that has produced a Disraeli, a Herschel, a Rubenstein, a Spinoza, is not so out of harmony with us that we can not assimilate it. I would not vote for a bill that would deny admission to a Jew for the simple and silly reason that he can not read.

Mr. Chairman, time will not permit me to dwell on each and every people. Why keep out the Greek? Why the Austrian? Are they so different from us? Read and study the history of these peoples and no one will claim that they are so different that they can not be assimilated. Place them in American environment and ere a generation has passed they will be one of us.

I have just mentioned a few people that will be greatly affected by the passage of this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, how about the German, the French, the Scandinavian, the Bohemian, and others that are so desirable? If this law had been in force in the first decade of this century nearly 35,000 Germans, over 6,000 French, over 10,000 Irish, over 3,000 Hollanders, over 2,200 Scandinavians, over 1,300 Bohemians, who were all otherwise qualified, would have been denied admission on account of the literacy test. Who here would have denied these good, wholesome immigrants admission? The injustice and unreasonableness of this illiteracy can be multiplied ad infinitum. If this law had been in force the last decade over 2,000,000 worthy immigrants would have been denied admission for the simple reason that they were illiterate.

In support of this bill the assertion is frequently made, "We do not want the illiterate of Europe." Mr. Chairman, it has been the illiterate immigrant that has been responsible for the decrease of illiteracy in our country. What are the facts as proved by Government statistics? The United States Commissioner of Education, in his letter of transmittal of Bulletin No. 51, recently issued, and entitled, "Education of the immigrant," says:

That these people—

Meaning immigrants—

are interested in education of their children, or at least obedient to the school-attendance laws, is shown by the fact that the least illiterate element of our children is the native-born children of foreign-born parents. The illiteracy among the children of native-born parents is three times as great as that among the native-born children of foreign-born parents.

This statement of the Commissioner of Education is borne out by census statistics:

Class.	1890	1900	1910
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Native white of native parentage	7.5	5.7	3.7
Native white of foreign or mixed parentage	2.2	1.6	1.1
Foreign-born white	13.1	12.9	12.7

This table shows that the illiteracy among native white of native percentage is 3.7 per cent and among the native white of foreign parentage is only 1.1 per cent. In spite of a steady stream of immigration, illiterate as it may be, the percentage of illiteracy in this country has decreased. In 1890, 13.3 per cent of the people 10 years or older were illiterate; in 1900, only 10.7 per cent were illiterate; and in 1910, 7.7 per cent were illiterate. The illiteracy among the foreign-born population has also decreased. In 1890 it was 13.1 per cent; in 1900, 12.9 per cent; and in 1910, 12.7 per cent. Statistics also show that where the immigrant has settled the illiteracy is less. In the North, where practically all the immigrants from Europe have settled, the illiteracy is less than one-third that of the South, where very few have gone.

I have prepared a little table, taking seven States of the North, where so many immigrants have settled, and seven States where very few have gone. This table shows the percentage of foreign born in each State named and the percentage of illiteracy:

	Foreign born.	Illiterate.
North:	Per cent.	Per cent.
Massachusetts	31.5	5.2
New York	30.2	5.5
Minnesota	26.0	3.0
New Jersey	26.0	5.6
Wisconsin	22.0	3.2
Illinois	21.4	3.7
Pennsylvania	18.8	5.9
South:
Louisiana	3.2	29.0
Kentucky	1.8	12.1

North Carolina	.3	18.5

Let us take some of the States where so many so-called illiterate foreigners have settled. In New York, where 30.2 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 5.5 per cent; in Pennsylvania, where 18.8 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 5.9 per cent; in Massachusetts, where 31.5 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 5.2 per cent; in Illinois, where 21.4 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 3.7 per cent; in Wisconsin, where 22 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 3.2 per cent; in the State of Alabama, from which comes the author of this bill, in which only nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 22.9 per cent; in Georgia, where six-tenths of 1 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 20.7 per cent; in Kentucky, where 18.1 per cent of the population is foreign born, the illiteracy is 12.1 per cent. Oh, gentlemen will say, that is due to the negro population. But compare the tables of these sections and States between the native-born whites and you will find that the illiteracy among the native-born whites of the South is also high.

Those who favor this bill cry out, "We are the dumping ground for the criminal of Europe." Mr. Speaker, it is repeatedly asserted that we do not want the criminal classes of Europe, and a statement by a certain prosecuting attorney in New Jersey is relied upon to prove that illiteracy is a badge of crime. To prove that the increase of crime in this country, if any, can not be placed at the door of the immigrant population I will insert here a table:

Prisoners.

Date enumerated.	Total, all classes.	Total foreign-born white.	Percentage of foreign-born white.
1880	58,609	12,105	20.6
1890	82,329	15,932	19.3
1904	81,772	12,945	15.8
1910	111,498	19,438	17.4
Committed during:
1904 [1]	149,691	35,093	23.4
1910 [1]	493,934	98,532	19.9

[1] The 1904 census did not include prisoners who were committed for nonpayment of fines, while the 1910 census includes them.

The foregoing table clearly demonstrates that crime better be laid somewhere else instead of at the door of our immigrants. In 1880 the percentage of foreign-born white prisoners to all prisoners was 20.6 per cent; on June 1, 1890, it was 19.3 per cent; on June 30, 1904, it was 15.8 per cent; and on January 1, 1910, it was 17.4 per cent. Of the total number of prisoners committed in year of 1904, 23.4 per cent were foreign-born white, and in year 1910 only 19.9 per cent were foreign-born white. Instead of crime being on the increase among our foreign-born population it is on the decrease, and that, too, in spite of the fact that it is repeatedly charged that the present-day immigrant is styled as an undesirable criminal while the old immigrant was desirable.

Of the 82,329 prisoners in 1890, 80,153 spoke English and 2,066 did not. Of the 15,932 foreign-born prisoners, 14,473 spoke English and 1,448 did not. Over 97 per cent of prisoners spoke English, and over 90 per cent of foreign-born prisoners spoke English. In 1904, 83 per cent of the prisoners were literate and 12.6 per cent were illiterate. Of this illiterate class, 1.1 per cent could read but not write, 11.5 per cent could neither read nor write. These figures and percentages do not show that illiteracy is a sign of crime, but, on the contrary, the criminal is illiterate.

Mr. Chairman, now as to insanity. It is repeatedly charged that insanity is on the increase and, of course, the whole thing is blamed on the present-day immigrant. The following table, taken from census reports, disproves the fact that the immigrant is responsible:

Insane in institutions.

Date enumerated.	Total all classes.	Total foreign-born white.	Per centage of foreign-born white.
1880	91,959	26,334	28+
1890	106,254	35,300	33+
1903	150,151	47,078	31+
1910	187,791	54,758	29+
Admitted during:
1904	49,622	13,405	27+
1910	60,769	15,523	25+

Mr. Chairman, an examination of this table tells us to look somewhere else than to the foreign immigrant for our insanity. The same is true as to the feeble-minded.

Feeble-minded in institutions.

Date enumerated.	Total all classes.	Total foreign-born white.	Percentage of foreign-born white.
1903	14,347	856	5.9
1910	20,731	1,247	6.0
Admitted during:
1904	2,599	182	7.0
1910	3,825	210	5.4

Even pauperism is charged to the immigrant. Let us examine the figures and see:

Paupers in almshouses.

Years:
1860	82,942
1870	76,737
1880	66,203
1890	73,045

From 1880 to 1910 I have the figures showing the number of foreign-born white paupers. In 1880 there were 22,967, or 34 per cent; in 1890 there were 27,648 foreign-born white paupers in almshouses, or 37 per cent; in 1904 there were 32,136, or 39 per cent; in 1910 there were 32,136, or 39 per cent. In 1904 there were admitted 81,412 paupers into almshouses, of whom 31,298 were foreign born, or 38 per cent; and 1910, out of a total of 88,313 admitted, 33,353, or 37 per cent, were foreign born. These figures show that pauperism is decreasing among foreign born instead of increasing.

It is repeatedly charged that there is too much congestion of the immigrants in our large cities. Does anyone propose to remedy this by the passage of this bill? If the honorable chairman and gentlemen of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization would study the proposition of the proper distribution of immigration and present a bill for that purpose, they would do a greater service to the country than presenting and trying to jam through a bill to choke off immigration, which has been so beneficial to this country.

Mr. Chairman, 10,000,000 acres of good farming land await the settler in the northern part of Wisconsin. We have in my State enough undeveloped good farm land to provide thousands of farms, thousands of homes. The foreign immigrant has been the most potent factor in the development of this great Commonwealth. From Germany, from Austria, Bohemia, and Hungary, Poland, France, Holland, and Belgium, Canada, from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, and in large numbers from the three northern Kingdoms, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, they came. Wisconsin gave them unstintingly of her gifts of plenty and contentment, and they have become loyal citizens of the State and the Nation. What is true of Wisconsin in this regard is true of many other States.

Mr. Chairman, let me give an analysis of the population ot Wisconsin, as disclosed by the census of 1910. The total population of my State in 1910 was 2,333,860. Of this number 1,807,986 were native-born whites and 512,569 foreign-born whites; 13,305 constitute the colored population. Of the 1,807,986 native whites 1,044,761 were of foreign or mixed parentage and 763,225 of native parentage. The total number of foreign-stock whites in my State was 1,557,330, making practically 70 per cent of the population. Mr. Chairman, a better people, a more cosmopolitan, a more industrious and prosperous people, a more homelike and peaceful people, a more liberty-loving people never lived than now live in Wisconsin. From the north of Europe we got the sturdy, stalwart Scandinavian; from the sunny gardens of Italy we got the romantic Italian; from the banks of the Rhine we got the industrious German; from the banks of the Shannon we got the versatile and wide-awake Irishman; from France, the polished Frenchman; from Belgium and Holland, the home-building and progressive Belgian and Dutch. We have got the hard-working and home-loving Poles and Bohemians; we have the despised Greek, and the persecuted Jews. They have all come to our shores, and I am proud of them all. I am glad they came. Had the proposed bill been a law in the past, I am safe in saying that fully 25 per cent of these people would not have come. And because they came, Mr. Chairman, our State has prospered and grown. It has advanced in industry, in education, and in all that is good in government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have disproved every argument that has been presented in support of this bill. I have proved by statistics that the present-day immigrant is not responsible for conditions chargeable to him. The immigrant has contributed to our advancement in education, science, and industry. He has proven himself loyal in time of need, and I do not want to stultify our country's progress by prescribing unjust and unreasonable discriminations against the immigrant. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the only explanation that I shall make in apology for bringing up a matter which is not connected with the bill under consideration is that it is of such importance to one of the subjects which is attracting the attention not only of this House but of the whole country, that I think it ought to be brought up at this time. I shall address myself to House bill 10245, which was introduced by me on January 27, a bill to provide for special tools and fixtures necessary for the immediate manufacture of arms, ammunition, and equipment in time of war.

The present struggle in the near eastern half of the world has produced, among other things, a most unprecedented demand for arms and ammunition. In war men without arms and ammunition are a liability rather than an asset. This has been demonstrated on many fields in Europe. The problem of obtaining an abundance of these necessities remains unsolved, at least so far as the allied powers are concerned. We know that at first the central powers were very much better supplied than their enemies, but we know less of their present situation in this regard. We are able to learn much more of the problem confronting the allies. It is common knowledge that when the belligerents realized their lack in this direction they not only turned all the possible resources of their own countries toward the production of these essentials, but, having access to the markets of neutral nations, proceeded to engage as far as possible the productive capacity of those nations to the same end. It is to the partial solution of the problem of providing an adequate supply of war materials for this country that I address myself.

Instead of attempting to cover the entire field of arms and ammunition, it will suit my purpose better to take as sufficient illustrations two absolutely essential articles—the rifle carried by the individual soldier and the time fuse necessary for the use of the projectile fired from the field guns.

It is not necessary to point out that these are not only essentials, but they are used in the greatest quantities. Let us first take the Infantry rifle. It is well known that soon after the outbreak of the present war the allied powers sent their representatives to the United States to buy and contract for staggering numbers of rifles. The need was obvious and urgent. In the judgment of their military men, battles were being lost, blood was being spilled, and treasure squandered unavailingly because rifles were lacking. Contracts were readily entered into with anyone who could produce the rifles, and produce them quickly. Time was the most essential element of every contract. These contracts were with some of the largest, most progressive, and up-to-date manufacturing concerns in this country. Peace reigned within our borders, our manufacturing industries were then at a low ebb, so that labor was plentiful and seeking employment. The profits to be made from these contracts were undoubtedly large. Every condition and every inducement were present to facilitate as much as possible the manufacture of arms. Yet what are the facts? Under the greatest possible pressure for early delivery more than a year elapsed before any considerable number of rifles were shipped from this country. What was the cause of this long delay? This brings me to the vital point bearing upon our own case. The reason for requiring so long a time is this: The modern military rifle is a complicated machine. I have one here [illustrating], one of our new-model Springfield rifles used in our service. I assure you, gentlemen, it is not loaded and there is no danger. For the highest efficiency all the rifles of an army must use the same ammunition and the parts must be interchangeable, so that you can take any part out of any rifle and it will fit into any other rifle. For the same reason we make our machine guns, and other countries do, to use the same ammunition that the rifle uses. This necessitates the greatest possible accuracy in construction. The parts must be jig made and finished to a gauge of the finest accuracy. The manufacture of these gauges and other special appliances requires the highest degree of skill and a long time to make them. As I have said, it has taken substantially a year for American manufacturers, with every incentive and under the most favorable circumstances, to manufacture the first rifle.

It may be a matter of surprise to some of you that in the manufacture of this rifle it requires 120 separate and distinct operations to finish the receiver alone. The receiver, as you all probably know, is that part of the rifle which contains the bolt and firing mechanism. In other words, 120 gauges of the utmost accuracy must be prepared before this essential part of the rifle can be made. So with various other parts of the rifle, thus necessitating a surprisingly large number of these gauges to manufacture the rifle at all in quantities. After one complete set is made, then additional sets can be made somewhat more rapidly and cheaply, but each must be made independently and separately. I have made inquiry of the Chief of Ordnance, Gen. Crozier, as to the cost of a sufficient quantity of these jigs, gauges, and special appliances from which to manufacture a thousand of these rifles in a day, and he has estimated that it would require only $275,000. A civilian engaged in the manufacture of firearms estimated for me that it could be done for $200,000. I believe Gen. Crozier to be more accurate than the civilian. This same civilian told me that if the necessary jigs, gauges, fixtures, and special appliances were furnished he could begin turning out rifles in quantities within two weeks, using the same machinery now used for making sporting rifles, or at least the machinery which was being so used before the present war. In short, instead of waiting a year we might have to wait two weeks after placing the contract before the rifles were being turned out in quantities.

What is our present situation in regard to rifles? Probably the best of anything connected with our Military Establishment. The fact is we have 700,000 of the new Springfield model and a little more than 300,000 of the old Krag, which is a most serviceable rifle, but subject to the inconvenience that it does not use the same ammunition. At our Government arsenals at Springfield and Rock Island we can manufacture something like 200,000 rifles a year, running eight hours a day. At this rate we could supply an army of a million men with rifles in five years, provided we did not have to make good the wastage.

The wastage, I should say, has proved to be at least 40 per cent, perhaps more, per year, though in some of the European countries it has been much greater than 40 per cent a year. Therefore, aside from the 700,000 rifles now in the hands of the Army, the National Guard, and in reserve, if we had a million men ready to spring to arms between sunrise and sunset, as suggested by one of our distinguished citizens, there would not be rifles to spring to; and if there were no way to increase the rapidity with which rifles might be turned out part of our million men would have served out a five years' enlistment before there were any rifles to place in their hands. By the plan proposed in my bill we can at a comparatively small expense place ourselves in readiness to begin turning out any desired number of rifles at a very short notice. Surely this would be an economy worth while, and one that we can effect without greatly endangering the public safety.

Another essential of war which I have chosen for an illustration is the time fuse necessary for the field-gun ammunition. One of the great surprises of the present war has been the large amount of field-gun ammunition that has been used. The amount almost staggers comprehension.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman mean by field-gun ammunition? I have heard that phrase used time and again.

Mr. TILSON. I will show the gentleman [illustrating]. I assure the gentleman this also is not loaded.

Mr. COX. I am asking for information now.

Mr. TILSON. This is the 3-inch shrapnel shell complete as it is used, except that it is not loaded; it is a dummy. There is nothing dangerous in it. And here is the time fuse [indicating]. You will note this little clockwork attachment. This [indicating] is the projectile sectionalized, so that you can see the several parts of the mechanism. This one is loaded with bullets, but it has no powder in it; so it is harmless. This is the part that does the business.

Mr. COX. What do you call that?

Mr. TILSON. This is shrapnel. It contains 252 bullets, fixed in rosin in the middle part of the chamber here. At the back part is a small charge of black powder. Here is a clockwork attachment, the time fuse, and I have several of these here to show you. Only one of them is loaded. That is the time fuse that is being made in large quantities in this country for Russia. Observe the little knobs for hand setting.

Mr. COX. Now, right there, can they gauge that fuse to burn just so long before it explodes?

Mr. TILSON. That is it. If the gentleman will take time to take one of those fuses apart, he will find there is what is called a time train, which consists of two little rings, one around here [indicating] and one around a little lower [indicating], and these are regulated by a graduated ring here [indicating], adjusted very nicely.

Mr. COX. Is there a maximum and minimum length of time for it to explode in?

Mr. TILSON. They can limit it to the smallest fraction of a second. They can locate it within 50 yards. It is extremely accurate as to the time of explosion. This [indicating], as I said before, is the complete shell. From here up [indicating] is the part that corresponds to the bullet of a rifle cartridge. The base of the shell has smokeless powder, which is consumed, of course, at the gun itself, and is used so as not to make a cloud of smoke that will show where we are, whereas in this smaller space at the base of the projectile we use black powder, in order to make as much of a cloud as we can where it hits, so as to locate the hit. The bullets are embedded in rosin, so that when the shell is exploded the rosin burns and makes a white cloud.

You will see, gentlemen, that this time fuse is a very complicated mechanism. This one, I would say, is our time fuse [indicating] made at the Frankford Arsenal. This [indicating] is a time fuse made by the American Locomotive Co., and it is made for Canada. If anybody can tell the difference, he is a better judge than I am. At any rate, it is very much like our own. Now, I have shown you these complicated instruments.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Can you tell us anything about the number of shells that we have loaded with high explosives? Is it not a fact that the shell being used in Europe is a high-explosive shell?

Mr. TILSON. The shrapnel is intended mainly for open work, as it spreads out like a fan and goes forward.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And used against men on top of the ground?

Mr. TILSON. Largely, or behind small shelter. But we have a high-explosive shell, and you can not tell which is which by looking at them. It is dropped into the trenches and explodes with a terrible explosion, throwing the bullets and fragments in every direction. The shrapnel has only powder enough to burst the container and release the bullets, which move forward with the same velocity which they had from the original force from the gun. The high-explosive shells are being used more where the deep trenches are. Through all the other fields of Europe shrapnel is the projectile that is used most, and that is the basis and the ground work of all field-artillery ammunition. The high-explosive projectiles are made on much the same principle and are made to shoot from the same gun.

You will see that the time fuse is a very delicate machine. It is almost the same as your watch, when you come to examine it, and almost as delicate. To make these in immense quantities you must have the gauges, jigs, and fixtures of which I have spoken. The time fuse must be made to explode the shell at exactly the right time—not too soon and not too late—in order to be effective. There are hundreds of factories in this country easily adaptable to the manufacture of these and other requisites of field-artillery ammunition. It requires, however, a large number of these gauges and special appliances to manufacture them.

A representative of one of the belligerents was in my office a few days ago and told me that he was in this country seeking manufacturers to make for him the special gauges necessary for the manufacture of the time fuses used in field-gun ammunition of all kinds. It was his special task to secure a sufficient number of these gauges to enable the manufacture on a very large scale of these time fuses. He told me he had been all over the United States, and had tied up by contract every factory that he could for the manufacture of the necessary gauges. I asked him how many different gauges were required to make these particular fuses. This [indicating] is the one they are making. He said it required over 200 gauges to make that one time fuse. He said that in one small city in this country he had 500 skilled workmen employed in making those gauges. He informed me that he had been given carte blanche, as the need was so urgent, that the price was hardly to be considered at all, and that every effort was being made toward getting these appliances at the earliest possible moment.

To illustrate the desperate straits and the eagerness with which they are seeking these appliances and seeking the ammunition, I can cite two examples of contracts for shrapnel. One contract for these [indicating] loaded, for $11 apiece. On another contract, of which I have reliable information, they are paying $23 a piece for an immense number of the same kind; and anywhere between those two prices, wherever they can procure anybody to make these things, they are paying for them and having them made.

Some of the gauges would have to be manufactured in larger numbers than others. For instance, we might need 5 of one kind of gauge and 25 of another kind, as the same number could be turned out in a given time from the 5 as could be turned out in the same time from the 25. I asked him about the cost of these gauges, and he informed me that they cost anywhere from $7 to $700 apiece, and that the complete outfit which he had contracted for cost him approximately $100,000.

As to the time it required to have the gauges made, he told me that with the very best of luck, and with every incentive in the way of increased price, he hoped to have the gauges ready to begin the manufacture of time fuses within six months from the time he began to have the gauges made. This does not take into account the preparation of the necessary specifications and blue prints. I show you here this ponderous tome [exhibiting] filled with these complicated blue prints. It takes all of these to make the gauges necessary to produce that one time fuse.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Have you any information at all as to how much time is required for the manufacture and completion of one of these fuses—if that is what you call it?

Mr. TILSON. It will take no appreciable time at all, after you get ready. You can turn them out in immense quantities by the repetitive process. But you must have a large number of these finely adjusted gauges to make them in this way. These can be made only by skilled workmen, and it requires a great deal of time to do it.

Mr. COX. But then it is all machine work after you have the preparation?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. In accordance with my proposition, within a week's time you could be turning out any quantities of these. Here it is 20 months after the beginning of hostilities in Europe, with the allies' soldiers perishing for want of these very things; and yet they are working on the gauges to get ready to begin the manufacture of the things they need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Could I have a little more time?

Mr. GOOD. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. TILSON. I would like 10 minutes if I can not get more.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. TILSON. I have spoken of the surprisingly large quantity of field-artillery ammunition that is being used in the present war. From the best information we are able to get from the western front in Europe, it will average about 25,000 rounds of field-artillery ammunition per day for every 1,000,000 troops. One gun in actual fight will use as high as 1,000 rounds a day. This has been done in France.

What is our situation in regard to the manufacture of field-artillery ammunition? For our little Army we have built, are building, and have planned for about 3,000 field guns of the several types; that is, if the plans go through, we shall have about 3,000 guns. Our Government manufactures its field-artillery ammunition at the Frankford Arsenal, and our entire capacity for the manufacture of this ammunition is just 1,500 projectiles per day. In other words, if we had our 3,000 guns ready—which we have not—we could make ammunition enough at our Government plant, running at full capacity, to enable each gun to fire one shot every other day, or three shots per week. [Laughter.]

The proposition of my bill is to manufacture in time of peace a reasonable reserve of these projectiles sufficiently large to keep us supplied for a reasonable time in case of war, within which time, by the use of the jigs, dies, gauges, and special appliances which it calls for, enough concerns can be started on the manufacture of this ammunition to keep our artillery plentifully supplied.

In my judgment, the people of the United States are beginning to realize that the situation in regard to some of these matters is really serious and are ready to meet it in the proper spirit.

What are the courses open to us? There are at least four. The first is to erect Government plants, fully equipped and including the very things provided for in my bill, sufficient to manufacture arms and ammunition as rapidly as we should need them in time of war. No one has attempted to estimate the number of millions, and perhaps billions, of dollars it would require to erect and equip enough manufacturing establishments to accomplish this purpose. If they were erected and equipped, they would stand idle, I hope, as long as they stood at all; but while they were standing idle they would depreciate, the machinery would obsolesce, and we should soon have to do the same thing over again. The mere statement of such a proposition is enough to show that it is practically impossible. We should never undertake it.

Another possible solution would be to manufacture and store a sufficiently large quantity of arms and ammunition to supply us during a war. No one knows how much such a plan as this would cost, as no one knows how much would be needed in the way of arms or ammunition; and even if we did, after manufacturing such an immense store, they would undoubtedly deteriorate to some extent and would begin to obsolesce.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a brief question?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Could these shells be manufactured and stored, and then the high explosive put in at any time they might be called into use?

Mr. TILSON. Not the high explosives. The loading of the time train can be done afterwards, but the high explosive would have to be put in the shell when it is made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When it is made?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think the gentleman will recall, for the information of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], that we had before our committee the testimony of Gen. Crozier, to the effect that most of our ammunition could be stored for 10 years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But not the modern explosive?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. All except the high-powered shells.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, it is claimed that there is no deterioration, and it does not deteriorate seriously within a short time; but I do not believe that it has been conclusively proved that it would not deteriorate at some time or other.

The third plan is to do nothing, but to go ahead and trust to luck. To me that course is unthinkable.

The fourth, and to my mind the only reasonable, course to pursue is the one proposed in my bill—the preparation of all the necessary jigs, dies, tools, gauges, and special fixtures of every kind necessary to manufacture the arms, ammunition, and equipment that would be required in time of war; to manufacture only a reasonable reserve of ammunition to keep on hand, and keep these special appliances in fireproof vaults ready, so that in case of war, or the imminence thereof, we could go out to private manufacturing concerns who had the buildings and machinery all ready for this class of work and contract with them for any quantity of the articles needed.

You may say that these would probably obsolesce. Absolutely so. Almost anything in this world grows old or out of date. If new and better rifles and field guns were invented, then we should have to change to some extent our gauges and special appliances.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. In the gentleman's judgment, what would be the cost of a sufficient quantity of these gauges and other special appliances?

Mr. TILSON. To purchase the things that we should absolutely require—and this is only a rough estimate—it would cost something like $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, and that would be the end of it until there was some change made. But bear in mind that these would not obsolesce any more rapidly than the plants and the equipment would obsolesce and no more rapidly than would accumulated arms and ammunition.

Mr. COOPER. To get this clearly in mind, that means simply the equipment—the gauges——

Mr. TILSON. The special equipment. We already have many factories that are equipped with the machines, lathes, turret lathes, and so forth.

Mr. COOPER. That does not mean buildings?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no; not at all. We have plenty of those, and of all the necessary machinery, except these special appliances that are used only for this one purpose and which, therefore, we have not on hand.

Much has been said about the manufacturers of arms and ammunition being the ones who are the most eager for preparation for war. We have heard the charge made, from time to time, that these men are more interested in profits than in preparedness. For my own part I believe such charges to be without foundation, but if there be any such person in this country so depraved as to place profits above patriotism, then my proposition will not appeal to him. It is certainly not in the interest of anyone who desires to manufacture large quantities of arms and ammunition and sell them to the Government at huge profits. On the contrary, it would save the Government from the tremendous expense of either erecting its own plants to stand idle and depreciate, or of manufacturing an enormous supply of these things to deteriorate and obsolesce. Best of all, if war should ever come it would find us in a position to go among manufacturers of the country who are prepared to make such articles and make the best possible terms, or, if necessary, commandeer such plants and run them as Government institutions. It can be, and should be, applied to all those articles that are used in immense quantities and require extensive preparation for their manufacture. It should include machine guns and aircraft of all kinds. By all means it should be extended to the Navy.

I have proposed something here which if adopted and worked out as it should be will do more to make us really prepared than anything else that has been suggested, and at the same time so economical that the cost is negligible as compared with that of any other course except nonresistance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TILSON. May I have just five minutes more?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I thank the gentleman.

I am convinced, after considerable study of the subject, that no plan of preparation which leaves out this feature can be effective. We may increase the Regular Army, create a volunteer force, and provide for a proper reserve, all good in their way; but unless the principle for which I am contending is adopted and carefully worked out our soldiers will be for a long time ineffective at the best, or sacrificed at the worst, if we ever come into conflict with any first-class power. I am sorry to be compelled to say what I am going to say, but it can do no harm, for our people are the only ones who do not know it already; but if to-morrow we became involved in war with any first-class power, we could not possibly supply within a year the arms and ammunition to fight a single battle of any magnitude. With the necessary articles I have suggested on hand—and I tell you frankly, upon the best of information, it will require more than a year to make them—we could, within 30 days at a maximum, begin turning out all the necessary arms and ammunition for any emergency.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman tell me whether there is any bureau or department of this Government upon which the responsibility rests of taking the initiative with reference to the matter the gentleman is speaking of, or does the initiative belong in this body?

Mr. TILSON. So far as I know, it began in this body with myself. I do not know that anyone else had considered it; but I took it up with the Ordnance Department and found that they were interested and were contemplating something a little bit different, but along the same general lines.

Mr. SANFORD. What I am getting at is this: Is there any department of the Government that recognizes the responsibility to take the initiative with reference to a matter of this kind?

Mr. TILSON. If any department should take the initiative it could not eventuate in anything without legislation. I hope to get an authorization by which hereafter we can appropriate any amount we think proper.

Mr. SANFORD. But we have to do the thinking first?

Mr. TILSON. The Ordnance Department is doing some good work on it, I believe.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not dispute that.

Mr. TILSON. If I were called upon to explain in the fewest possible words the situation in Europe for the last 20 months, I should say Germany had the gauges, Great Britain had none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. To whom do the gauges belong that are being used by our factories which are making ammunition for Europe now?

Mr. TILSON. They have been paid for, at a tremendous cost, by the belligerent Governments; that is, such gauges as have been made. They are still making them, you understand.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do they belong to those Governments or to us?

Mr. TILSON. They do not belong to us. They may belong to private individuals.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Speaking of the importance of the rifle, was not the testimony before our committee that Germany did not have gauges for rifles, but that she had 25,000,000 rifles? And which would you rather have, 25,000,000 rifles or the gauges?

Mr. TILSON. I would rather have the rifles, but I would rather have the gauges than to have neither. [Applause.] Is it not worth while, as a matter of economy, as well as a matter of insurance, if we believe in preparation at all, to set about providing for those things without which all else is ineffective?

I have not here attempted flights of oratory or the common practice of trying to stir the emotions by references to patriotism and the flag. I would rather bring to this House something valuable, something that will be of real service to my country, than by the clever use of a few fine phrases to stir a multitude and receive the plaudits of thousands. If accepted and acted upon, as I believe they will be, the suggestions I have here presented will have contributed something toward the national defense and the safety of the Republic, which of itself is a sufficient reward. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague [Mr. SIMS] 20 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has made a very interesting and learned speech, but he said a good many things that it seems to me, under the circumstances, would have been better left unsaid. Perhaps to-night will be one of the momentous nights in the history of the world, and I think it behooves us at such a time as this to forget partisan politics and political advantage or personal excoriation and criticism.

Much has been said on the question of defensive armament. When is a merchant vessel pursuing the course that peaceful commerce permits, and what takes it out of the channel of a peaceful merchant vessel and converts it into a vessel of war?

This war began on the last of July or the first of August, 1914. I do not remember just when England declared war. I think it was several days after the 1st of August.

Mr. PLATT. August 3.

Mr. SIMS. The question was raised through diplomatic channels in August, 1914, as to the rights of a defensively armed merchant vessel in our ports. The question was raised by Great Britain. It was contested by Germany, and our Government stated its position with reference to the representations of that Government. It made it at a time when the submarine question had not become acute, at a time when there was as much coolness and deliberation as could well exist on the part of the Governments concerned, and especially of our own Government. It was made at a time when William J. Bryan was Secretary of State—and nobody will ever accuse him of having been a war jingo, and no one will claim there is any probability that he ever will be one.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can do a real public service by putting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the correspondence that was carried on between these Governments at a time, so far as effect on us is concerned, when a national election was more than two years off and when there was no temptation to seek political advantage in declaring a status with reference to armed or unarmed vessels. Therefore I will ask your consent to place in the RECORD the memorandum of the British Embassy at Washington, September 19, 1914, on this question of defensively armed ships. Then I will place in the RECORD the memorandum of the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, to the German Empire, made on September 19, 1914, declaring the status of armed merchant vessels.

The first paragraph of that statement is:

"A merchant vessel of a belligerent nation may carry armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship at war."

That was the statement of our position with reference to a merchant vessel armed for defensive purposes. I will put in the whole statement, in which our Government goes on to state what will be regarded as indications that a merchant ship was armed only for defensive purposes. But in this same statement I call attention to one particular part, and that is that "Port authorities, on the arrival in any port of the United States of an armed vessel of belligerent nationality claimed to be a merchant vessel, should immediately investigate and report to Washington on the foregoing indications as to the intended use of armament in order that it may be determined whether the evidence is sufficient to remove the presumption that the vessel is and should be treated as a ship of war. Clearance will not be granted until authorized from Washington, and the master will be so informed upon arrival."

That statement was made on the 19th of September, 1914. I want to say that every nation on earth and every citizen of every nation on earth, as well as all citizens of the United States, had a perfect right to assume beyond cavil or question that this special investigation as to whether or not a particular ship was armed simply for defensive purposes was to be determined by the Government here in Washington before clearance was issued and we must assume and conclude that it was lawful, legal, proper, and right for any person to engage passage on such a ship, and that no man in doing so was himself reckless of his own life or of the interest of his country because he trusted in the good faith and honesty of our own Government in its investigation thus made as to each and every vessel to which clearance was issued. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will, but I promised the gentleman who is to follow me that I would use as little time as possible.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman why if these rules are still in existence does the gentleman preface his remarks here by stating that this is one of the most momentous times in our history?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman knows without asking the question, the gentleman knows that notice has been served on our Government as to what will take place upon certain contingencies. I want to do as little commenting as I can as I am simply stating the facts as to the correspondence that took place when excitement was not high, and when all the Governments concerned were giving serious consideration to the facts.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. For a very brief question.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman has spoken of vessels clearing from our ports. Suppose the citizen takes passage on a liner sailing from Italy?

Mr. SIMS. That does not arise within the scope of my statement, as this correspondence all took place before Italy was in the war.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to have the gentleman have read in his time the correspondence that he alludes to. Do not subject us to reading it in the fine print of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SIMS. The trouble is I can not get the time to do so.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Perhaps some one on the other side will yield it to you.

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad if I can get it. Now, on October 15 a telegram from our ambassador at Berlin gives the German contention on this subject, and the reply of the Secretary of State was made on November 7, 1914. I will now read all these memoranda, because the gentleman from Rhode Island asked me to do so.

[Memorandum from the British Embassy.]

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, September 9, 1914.

The German Government have openly entered upon the policy of arming merchant ships as commerce destroyers, and even claim the right to carry out the process of arming and equipping such merchant ships in neutral harbors or on the high seas. It is in consequence of this that the British Admiralty have been compelled, in acordance with the practice followed in the great wars of history, to arm a certain number of British merchant ships for self-defense only.

The practice of arming ships in self-defense is very old, and has been ordered by royal proclamation in England from early in the seventeenth century. During the Napoleonic wars the right to arm in self-defense was recognized by British and United States prize courts in the cases of the Catherine Elizabeth (British) and the Nereide (United States). The right of a merchant ship of a belligerent to carry arms and resist capture is clearly and definitely laid down in modern times. The right of resistance of merchant vessels is recognized by the United States Naval War Code, by the Italian Code for Mercantile Marine, and by the Russian Prize Regulations. Writers of authority in many European countries also recognize the right. To mention a German authority, it may be stated that the late Dr. Perels, at one time legal adviser to the German Admiralty, quotes with approval article 10 of the United States Naval War Code, which states: "The prisoners of merchant vessels of an enemy who, in self-defense and in protection of the vessel placed in their charge, resist an attack are entitled to the status of prisoners of war." The Institute of International Law, at its meeting in 1913, prepared and adopted a manual of laws of naval warfare, article 10 of which expressly declared that private ships are allowed to employ force to defend themselves against the attack of an enemy's ship.

A merchant vessel armed purely for self-defense is therefore entitled, under international law, to enjoy the status of a peaceful trading ship in neutral ports, and His Majesty's Government do not ask for better treatment for British merchant ships in this respect than might be accorded to those of other powers. They consider that only those merchant ships which are intended for use as cruisers should be treated as ships of war, and that the question whether a particular ship carrying an armament is intended for offensive or defensive action must be decided by the simple criterion whether she is engaged in ordinary commerce and embarking cargo and passengers in the ordinary way. If so, there is no rule in international law that would justify such a vessel, even if armed, being treated otherwise than as a peaceful trader.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 19, 1914.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: I am inclosing for your information two memoranda which the department has issued to-day and which define the general rules which this Government will follow in dealing with cases involving the status of armed merchant vessels visiting American ports, and with cases of merchant vessels suspected of carrying supplies to belligerent warships from American ports.

I am, etc.,

ROBERT LANSING.

[Inclosure.]

THE STATUS OF ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

A. A merchant vessel of belligerent nationality may carry an armament and ammunition for the sole purpose of defense without acquiring the character of a ship of war.

B. The presence of an armament and ammunition on board a merchant vessel creates a presumption that the armament is for offensive purposes, but the owners or agents may overcome this presumption by evidence showing that the vessel carries armament solely for defense.

C. Evidence necessary to establish the fact that the armament is solely for defense and will not be used offensively, whether the armament be mounted or stowed below, must be presented in each case independently at an official investigation. The result of the investigation must show conclusively that the armament is not intended for, and will not be used in, offensive operations.

Indications that the armament will not be used offensively are:

1. That the caliber of the guns carried does not exceed 6 inches.
2. That the guns and small arms carried are few in number.
3. That no guns are mounted on the forward part of the vessel.
4. That the quantity of ammunition is small.
5. That the vessel is manned by its usual crew and the officers are the same as those on board before war was declared.

(Same to the British, French, and Japanese ambassadors in Washington, and the Belgian minister.)

6. That the vessel intends to and actually does clear for a port lying in its usual trade route or a port indicating its purpose to continue in the same trade in which it was engaged before war was declared.
7. That the vessel takes on board fuel and supplies sufficient only to carry it to its port of destination or the same quantity substantially which it has been accustomed to take for a voyage before war was declared.
8. That the cargo of the vessel consists of articles of commerce unsuited for the use of a ship of war in operations against an enemy.
9. That the vessel carries passengers who are as a whole unfitted to enter the military or naval service of the belligerent whose flag the vessel flies, or any of its allies, and particularly if the passenger list includes women and children.
10. That the speed of the ship is slow.

D. Port authorities, on the arrival in a port of the United States of an armed vessel of belligerent nationality, claiming to be a merchant vessel, should immediately investigate and report to Washington on the foregoing indications as to the intended use of the armament, in order that it may be determined whether the evidence is sufficient to remove the presumption that the vessel is, and should be treated as, a ship of war. Clearance will not be granted until authorized from Washington, and the master will be so informed upon arrival.

E. The conversion of a merchant vessel into a ship of war is a question of fact which is to be established by direct or circumstantial evidence of intention to use the vessel as a ship of war.

[Ambassador Gerard to the Secretary of State.]
[Telegram—Paraphrase.]

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
Berlin, October 15, 1914—7 p. m.

Mr. Gerard transmits the following memorandum which he says he has received from the German War Office:

"An official notice appearing in the Westminster Gazette of September 21, 1914, states that the Department of State at Washington has ruled that ships of belligerent nations when equipped with ammunition and armament shall be treated nevertheless, while in American ports, as merchant ships, provided the armament serves for defensive purposes only. This ruling wholly fails to comply with the principles of neutrality. The equipment of British merchant vessels with artillery is for the purpose of making armed resistance against German cruisers. Resistance of this sort is contrary to international law, because in a military sense a merchant vessel is not permitted to defend itself against a war vessel, an act of resistance giving the warship * * * with crew and passengers. It is a question whether or not ships thus armed should be admitted into ports of a neutral country at all. Such ships in any event should not receive any better treatment in neutral ports than a regular warship, and should be subject at least to rules issued by neutral nations restricting the stay of a warship. If the Government of the United States considers that it fulfills its duty as a neutral nation by confining the admission of armed merchant ships to such ships as are equipped for defensive purposes only, it is pointed out that so far as determining the warlike character of a ship is concerned the distinction between the defensive and offensive is irrelevant. The destination of a ship for use of any kind in war is conclusive, and restrictions as to the extent of armament afford no guarantee that ships armed for defensive purposes only will not be used for offensive purposes under certain circumstances."

[The Acting Secretary of State to Ambassador Gerard.]
[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 7, 1914.

Your 515, October 15. The Government of the United States is obliged to dissent from the views of the German Government as expressed in your telegram in regard to the treatment to be accorded armed merchant vessels of belligerent nationality in neutral ports. The practice of a majority of nations and the consensus of opinion by the leading authorities on international law, including many German writers, support the proposition that merchant vessels may arm for defense without losing their private character, and that they may employ such armament against hostile attack without contravening the principles of international law.

The purpose of an armament on a merchant vessel is to be determined by various circumstances, among which are the number and position of the guns on the vessel, the quantity of ammunition and fuel, the number and sex of the passengers, the nature of the cargo, etc. Tested by evidence of this character, the question as to whether an armament on a merchant vessel is intended solely for defensive purposes may be readily answered, and the neutral government should regulate its treatment of the vessel in accordance with the intended use of the armament.

The Government considers that in permitting a private vessel having a general cargo, a customary amount of fuel, an average crew, and passengers of both sexes on board, and carrying a small armament and a small amount of ammunition, to enjoy the hospitality of an American port as a merchant vessel it is in no way violating its duty as a neutral. Nevertheless, it is not unmindful of the fact that the circumstances of a particular case may be such as to cause embarrassment and possible controversy as to the character of an armed private vessel visiting its ports. Recognizing, therefore, the desirability of avoiding a ground of complaint, this Government, as soon as a case arose, while frankly admitting the right of a merchant vessel to carry a defensive armament, expressed its disapprobation of a practice which compelled it to pass upon a vessel's intended use, which opinion, if proven subsequently to be erroneous, might constitute a ground for a charge of unneutral conduct.

As a result of these representations no merchant vessels with armaments have visited the ports of the United States since the 10th of September. In fact, from the beginning of the European war but two armed private vessels have entered or cleared from ports of this country, and as to these vessels their character as merchant vessels was conclusively established.

Please bring the foregoing to the attention of the German Government, and in doing so express the hope that they will also prevent their merchant vessels from entering the ports of the United States carrying armaments even for defensive purposes, though they may possess the right to do so by the rules of international law.

LANSING.

Mr. SIMS. That is as clear as can be expressed in the English language, and there it says the character of the vessel is to be determined by the purpose for which it is armed, as to whether it is a war vessel or a vessel of peace, and in each case our Government investigates that very question and gives clearance, because it finds that each and every ship so cleared is not a ship of war.

That was November 7, 1914. Remember that Congress was in session all the time during the time the correspondence was going on and that it was all made public. Who can remember of any uprising anywhere in the United States in contravention of the position taken by our Government at that time and published to all the world? Did not every citizen, with no thought of stirring up trouble or of bringing on war, have the moral and legal right to travel on a ship after our Government had given it clearance as a peaceable merchant ship and entitled to treatment as such?

Now, I am not going to read a word referred to that did not occur in this diplomatic controversy while the Hon. W. J. Bryan was Secretary of State. No man dare intimate or insinuate that Mr. Bryan was not in favor of peace or that he would yield the rights of peace in order to promote the purposes of war, and his position was proven beyond question when a doubt arose as to whether or not one of the notes of our Government would bring war on this country, and rather than sign it he resigned. I want to read you now what Mr. Bryan said about using submarines for the purpose of capturing prizes or vessels carrying contraband of war. This note is the famous note issued on May 13, 1915, by this Government. Here is, in part, what Mr. Bryan said:

"The Government of the United States therefore desires to call the attention of the Imperial German Government, with the utmost earnestness, to the fact that the objection to their present method of attack against the trade of their enemies lies in the practical impossibility of employing submarines in the destruction of commerce without disregarding those rules of fairness, reason, justice, and humanity which all modern opinion regards as imperative. It is practically impossible for the officers of a submarine to visit a merchantman at sea and examine her papers and cargo. It is practically impossible for them to make a prize of her; and if they can not put a prize crew on board of her, they can not sink her without leaving her crew and all on board of her to the mercy of the sea in her small boats. These facts, it is understood, the Imperial German Government frankly admit. We are informed that in the instances of which we have spoken time enough for even that poor measure of safety was not given, and in at least two of the cases cited not so much as a warning was received. Manifestly submarines can not be used against merchantmen, as the last few weeks have shown, without an inevitable violation of many sacred principles of justice and humanity."

Sacred principles—violation of sacred principles! What is a sacred principle? It is the highest principle of which we can have mental conception, a principle sacred, hallowed, holy, God-given and God-approved. Shall we now relax in favor of a murderous instrument of war that can be used only in violation of the most sacred principles by which humanity can possibly be governed? Talk about the speech of Mr. Bryan at Chicago, the "crown of thorns and cross of gold" speech! That speech, as to eloquence and truth, justice and humanity, sinks into insignificance compared to Mr. Bryan's utterances in this note. Listen to a little more of it:

"American citizens act within their indisputable rights in taking their ships and in traveling wherever their legitimate business calls them upon the high seas and exercise those rights in what should be the well-justified confidence that their lives will not be endangered by acts done in clear violation of universally acknowledged international obligations, and certainly in the confidence that their own Government will sustain them in the exercise of their rights. * * *

"Expressions of regret and offers of reparation in case of the destruction of neutral ships sunk by mistake, while they may satisfy international obligations, if no loss of life results, can not justify or excuse a practice the natural and necessary effect of which is to subject neutral nations and neutral persons to new and immeasurable risks.

"The Imperial German Government will not expect the Government of the United States to omit any word or any act necessary to the performance of its sacred duty of maintaining the rights of the United States and its citizens and of safeguarding their free exercise and enjoyment."

Are these obsolete rights? These are the last words of Mr. Bryan on this question while in his high office, and they are as holy as the purpose intended to be served, as the rights intended to be protected. Shall we stand by Bryan or by Bernstorff? Choose you this day whom you will serve. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some interest to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and have not yet been able to definitely conclude in my own mind whether his speech was intended in the interest of peace or intended as a declaration of war upon the Democratic leaders of the House. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reply to two several comments upon my brief remarks in support of the homestead bill passed by the House and now pending in the Senate permitting tenant farmers to take the remaining public domain in 640-acre tracts.

A few days following the making of these remarks a newspaper known as The Public, published in Chicago, and, I observe, edited by one Louis Post, and another newspaper called the Johnstown Democrat, owned and edited by one WARREN WORTH BAILEY, made certain criticisms of my position. Both of these criticisms are practically in the same language. Members of this House doubtless know one of these gentlemen, but as to the other, who ever heard of Louis Post's being a Democrat, either from party affiliations or adherence to principles? And quoting from my speech they quote me as saying "Oklahoma has 42,177 acres of land. This would make 570,000 homesteads of 640 acres each." This is quoted as an exact wording and paragraphing from my remarks, which shows a deliberate attempt to misrepresent in order to bolster up a weak cause. What I stated was that we had 330,000,000 acres of public land divided among the States, giving the names of the States, and naming Oklahoma last. Then, beginning with a new paragraph, I said that this would make the number of homesteads mentioned. It happened that the printer substituted a 7 where there ought to have been a 2, but the new paragraph in my speech made it clear to anybody that I was not referring to the number of acres in Oklahoma, but to the amount in all of the States named. When these gentlemen separated the Oklahoma phrase and connected it with the first sentence in the following paragraph, they made a mistake intended evidently to be unfair. I may state that the exact number of homesteads our public land would make, exclusive of the lands in Alaska, would be 515,625, enough to supply approximately one-fourth of the tenant farmers in the United States each with a home.

These gentry proceed then to say:

MURRAY thinks that this system ought to be continued. Does he know the history of his own State? If so, what makes him believe that the homestead law would be any better?

Continuing, this newspaper further says:

Oklahoma, with Texas, has the double honor of being the most land-ridden State in the Union. Does not Congressman MURRAY see that if he should succeed in finding homes for the tenant farmers of to-day there must be the same decadence?

In the first place, this statement is untrue. Neither Oklahoma nor Texas, proportionate to the population, is the most thoroughly tenant-ridden State in the Union. There are more than a half dozen States in the Union with more tenants than Oklahoma. Moreover, the tenant conditions in Oklahoma were not produced by homesteading the public domain. Out of the 104,000 in that State, 75 per cent of them are located in the Five Civilized Tribes and the Osage Nation, none of which country was homesteaded, and, belonging to the Indians, it was allotted in severalty. Since they declined to work it, it has been farmed by tenants. In the west half of the State, where, excepting some 3,500,000 acres of school and building lands, the public domain was homesteaded, are the fewest number of tenants. If this argument were true, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, Montana, and the Dakotas would be equally tenant ridden, and yet in some of these States less than 15 per cent of the farm population are tenants, and this number is not unwholesome. Tenant conditions in any country is a blight upon such country, but a small per cent—8 or 10 per cent of the country—is essential in this particular, that when a man leaves his father's roof, owns a team but not the land, is given an opportunity to rent land he is taking the first step in order to become a home owner. If this condition could not be recognized, production would be lower and the all-important problem of civilization and society in general, so far as it relates to farm lands, depends upon ample production, in order that the cost of living to the people in the city will not become too great.

Heavy cost of foodstuffs means higher price to the city laborer, the man at the machine and in the shop, and the manufacturer, which must needs increase his wage, because, fundamentally, the first element in the fixing of a wage is the cost of keep, but in turn makes the expense of the manufactured product higher to be sold to the farmer, and in turn makes his product higher to the general consumer. This ought to be clear, that for the benefit of all classes ample production ought to be secured.

The Chicago Public further says that "Mr. MURRAY advocates a rural-credit system for the tenant farmer, and that such system would only exaggerate the matter." Then it further adds:

The only remedy is to reserve the unearned increment and adopt the single-tax system on land.

Now, you have the purpose of their making this deliberate misrepresentation, to wit, to bolster up the cause of the single tax, which is a principle enunciated some two decades ago by Henry George, which, in effect, is that land should be the only wealth subject to taxation and that all other property should be exempt, or that the "increment" to the extent of the rental value should be owned by the Government or society in general.

Now, if these gentlemen claim to be better mathematicians than I, whether it involves long division or the rule of three—geometry, trigonometry, calculus, shades, and shadows, even to the extent of perfection "According to Gunter," I will agree with them; but I do not yield to them, nor to any other person living, a sounder or more thorough knowledge of the powers making for civilization or the elements preserving it, and in such knowledge I am not obliged to grasp dogmas and theories, whether practical or not, upon which to sustain a strong, healthy civilization.

THREE SCHOOLS OF LAND OWNERSHIP.

There are three theories of ownership of land.

First. "Cooperative ownership," or an ownership in which one individual has no right beyond that of any other, or in effect no private ownership, as advocated by the Socialists.

Second. A "divided ownership;" that is, an ownership of possession without the fee by the individual, while the rents, profits, or "increments" belong to the State, to be brought about by the single tax.

Third. "Absolute ownership," or that complete ownership by the occupant, in fee, rents, and "increments," to use a popular phrase, "from the center of the earth to the skies."

I have analyzed these three principles governing land ownership from their effect upon civilization in the past, and I unhesitatingly state that it is my conclusion that the divided ownership advocated by the single-tax advocates is the worst of all not only for the farmer, but for all persons in society. In saying this I have no criticism against Henry George, its author.

One of the vivid recollections of my youth has been the story of his great struggle to become mayor of the city of New York. I remember, too, the announcement in the midst of his campaign of his nervous breakdown, which took him out of the campaign and caused his premature death. I remember the newspaper accounts, that upon the night of his fatal illness multitudes surrounded his home eager to get the least expression that "He is better"; that at 12 o'clock the news came, "He is worse"; that at 2 o'clock his faithful wife leaned over his bedside eager to hear him whisper, "I am better," and his reply that he would like to live long enough to become mayor of New York in order that he might be able to alleviate the sufferings of the poor. At 4 o'clock Henry George was a corpse. A multitude of his fellow citizens followed him to his last resting place. The philosophy and genius of a nation eulogized his name. Statesmen vied with each other to do him homage, but in that concourse of mourners it was well known there were those who would have rushed into their midst and written across the casket "Henry George is an anarchist." This fact caused me to sympathize with the good purpose of the man and to scrutinize all his writings in an eager endeavor to find the least grain of truth and of practical statesmanship. Some of his suggestions I believe to be sound, but the doctrine of single tax or reserved increment, with regret and disappointment, I am compelled to pronounce but a dream of good intentions. The trouble with Mr. George was that he understood only the corner lot and the congested conditions of the great city, but he did not understand the conditions of farm lands or of the law of food production. He had observed the vacant lot in the great city left without improvements, upon which great manufacturing plants could have been built and given employment to labor. This brought him to the conclusion that if this lot could be taxed, with the improvements exempt, it would force the sale of its possession. And, true enough, his policy could have been made practical in such congested centers, and in some particulars it would have proven wholesome; but, applied to farm lands, it would in practice not only have proven vicious, not alone to the farmer but the man in the city. Farm lands to-day do not pay interest on the investment. It is only the increased increment and the valuation by upkeep and improvement that justifies a farmer's building up a farm possession.

In a conversation with one of his enthusiastic admirers upon my presenting this side of the question and further showing him that the city lot did not deteriorate whether used or not, while farm property began deterioration in the absence of constant upkeep the moment it was reduced to cultivation, and that without such upkeep its minerals would be washed away to the sea. He replied, "Oh, yes; Mr. George knew the country. He himself related to me the story that when the 'dream' came to him"—observe he called it a dream—"he was riding through the country for exercise out from the city of New York and observed the great apparent unoccupied acres and questioned himself mentally what could be the result if such could be occupied." And then, says my informant, "the dream took hold of him in earnest." But the trouble with the observation of this follower of Henry George was that he had never recognized that often men may spend months and years in the country without studying or learning their problems, just like often enough a man may get mud on his feet, and be absolutely unaware of it until his wife informs him of it as he puts his muddy feet upon the carpet. This story reminds me of the man who for years has studied the theory and the science of farming from books only and then imagines that he knows all about the subject. True enough, a study of the philosophy and theory upon which the science is based is helpful and I have no desire to minimize its importance, but as he reads from the book one line he must turn and look at the furrow and by actual practice follow the plow down that furrow if he would get accurate knowledge of the science of agriculture, and whenever he finds that the theory of the book is not confirmed by the actual experiment, sometimes running into a series of experiments of an entire weather cycle of that section, he will have to abandon the theory of the book as impractical, if not verified by the actual practice. The man who studies agriculture only from the book may conclude that it is altogether poetry, but when he gets into the furrow and follows the plow to the end of the row and back again, he will discover it is altogether prose.

Moreover, the city lot can stand a single tax because of the amount of industry or machinery possible to put upon it for the employment of labor; but it is impossible to put enough improvement or investment, whether in the form of stock or machinery, upon farm, meadow, or grazing lands to enable them to bear a single tax. The double tax on land when sold on a credit or mortgaged for money borrowed now pursued by the taxing policies of most States causes its owner to groan under the burden. Then how could we expect them to bear the whole of taxation with all other forms of property exempt?

The most fallacious and senseless argument made by the advocates of the single tax is that it will "abolish poverty." This is neither possible nor intended under the economy of Divine Providence. "For ye have the poor always with you." We may abolish misery and suffering. We may raise the standard of living above want. We may correct the inequality of the distribution of wealth, and thus make it more equitable and just. This would leave no one rich. It would merely mean that they would be prosperous and happy, above misery and want. This is the state in which Divine Providence intended man to be, because it is under hardships, self-restraint, and self-denial that the best in the individual comes out. It is that universal law or struggle in nature for a "survival of the fittest." It is this that makes necessity "the mother of invention." If we were all from childhood given our wants to a full measure, passion and appetite would run riot, destroying the mental and moral forces that make the great men and women. It is only by self-denial and control of passions and appetite that humanity is brought up to a full realization of strength and force above the brute creation. I am not sure but what the philosophy of the poet is sound in that there is a real—

JOY OF INCOMPLETENESS.

If all our lives were one broad glare of sunlight, clear unclouded;
If all our paths were smooth and fair, with no soft gloom enshrouded;
If all life's flowers were fully blown without the sweet unfolding—
Would we not miss the twilight hours, the gentle haze and sadness;
Would we not long for storm and showers to break the constant gladness?

If all creation were perfect, and nothing left to do, what service could we render, or unto what good cause could we minister?

With these present-day advocates of single tax the trouble is they do not even know the city side as it was understood by Mr. George. They drink down unhesitatingly all this propaganda with all their impractical knowledge until it forms a mere claptrap for the rabble.

PRODUCTION SOCIETY'S INTEREST.

What is the fundamental interest of society in agrarian laws or laws governing lands? To that question I answer, "production"; to make it possible that foodstuffs be produced in ample quantity; otherwise the expenses of living become unusually high and the laboring man, when only temporarily out of employment is obliged to see his family suffer, and whatever will make easier ample production must first be considered by the State. This is where the single tax applied to the country becomes harmful, for the question of production above all things else whatsoever should most concern the lawgiver and statesman. Every great populated country, every congested population has suffered the consequences of underproduction. Hence private rights, if need be, must be sacrified in order to produce foodstuffs enough for man. Let us analyze the single tax from this standpoint. Much of our evil to-day is not due to legislation or the policy of political parties, but because of underproduction and the consequent result in high cost of living, the struggle of the poor, the struggle of all. Suppose we were to adopt for the future that policy and reserve to the State to extent of all rental and increased value or the increment of all farm lands, what would be the result? The farmer who goes out onto the prairie knows that this is the cheapest land upon which a farm home may be made, but even there when he constructs a fence and builds a house, plows up the sod, and reduces it from its wild state to a state of cultivation will find that this extra work is well worth all of the "increment," rents, and profits for at least five years, and from that period on there is a constant tendency toward deterioration in the soil fertility. The minerals may be leached from the soil; the nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and potash out of which foodstuffs are grown may be washed away to the sea; a rivulet here and a flow of water there may each produce one or more ditches, require a constant care and upkeep, or at the end of another five years there will be no further production without extra cost of fertilizers and of expensive cultivation to make it worth what it was at the time the sod was first broken. Should he go into a timber country and undertake to chop down the trees, eradicate stumps, roots, and grubs, he will find that it will require more time in which to pay him for the extra labor placed upon his newly built farm home. And what will become of the waste places, of the overflow, and swamp lands?

Suppose a farmer in his young manhood goes into some large timbered valley, buys 160 acres at $10 an acre. He begins by splitting rails, cutting out the briers, small trees, and brush, and deadening the large timber. Year after year he is compelled to use only the most primitive plow, thereby forced to substitute physical effort for labor-saving machinery; every spring to burn up the fallen limbs and trees, and at the end of the first decade he has just begun. He observes that every three or five years an overflow comes, washing away his entire crop, fence, and ofttimes his stock. Then he realizes that at a heavy cost of labor he must construct ditches and levees to keep down the overflow, and then perhaps after another decade he will have all the stumps eradicated, all the grubs and roots pulled, and for the first time is enabled to use improved machinery and lessen his hard labor; but then to discover that when a rain continues for a few weeks his level soil will not drain. Then he must put in an underground tile-drain system, as the farmers of Illinois and Iowa have done, at a cost of from $10 to $40 an acre, to draw the surface water down from the roots of the crop so that it will not water-log and kill it. At last he has a farm—a farm he has made. He has spent almost a lifetime in making this farm. During all these years he has been compelled to endure the storms and floods. He has been obliged to fight swamp fever, chills and malaria, gallinippers, rattlesnakes, and mosquitoes, but he has made a farm worth, perhaps, $200 an acre. Under such circumstances who owns the difference between $10 and $200? Who would be so bold as to claim, as do, in fact, the single-tax advocates, that this difference belongs to the State, and not to the farmer who made it, to be retained by him in his old age and passed to his children? The man who would claim this is an impractical dreamer, degenerated into a mental anarchist. [Applause.]

If he did not own this "increment" in the completest sense, he would not have undertaken to redeem that waste place, nor would anyone else. If every man is to become a tenant and not an owner beyond a mere right of possession, he would rob the soil of all that he could extract from it. There would be no purpose or duty on his part, at least no interest for that constant upkeep to preserve the soil so necessary the moment virgin soil is reduced to cultivation. If the public should own the increment, should secure all of the profits, there would be no increment or profits. It would soon be wasted, to the great detriment of the public. And this is wherein the interest of society, as well as the individual farmer, is wrapped up in his absolute and complete ownership of his farm. Yes; in all the experience of man it is best illustrated that private ownership of land is the best, and this ownership is of ancient practice and duration.

The oldest sale and purchase of real estate in all history is recited in the twenty-third chapter of Genesis, giving the boundary, the sale, the consideration, and all. This chapter will also disclose that the buyer, Abraham, was offered a free burial place; but he refused it, as he desired complete ownership even for that purpose. You will notice in that chapter he purchased from Ephraim "the field and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in the borders around about"; and in this purchase the land thus described and bounded "were made secure unto Abraham," he paying therefor the sum of "400 shekels of silver current with the merchant." This transfer—"made secure," as the Bible puts it—was made presumably under the then law of the land, not by written deed recorded but by word of mouth in the presence of numerous witnesses, so that no mistake could be made by public proclamation "before all that went in at the gate of his city."

The facts in this purchase by Abraham from Ephraim, an individual owner, is further conclusive proof that land had been owned, bought, and sold even prior to that, which, according to Archbishop Asher, took place at least 1,860 years before Christ, or 3,776 years ago. In all the history of the world such ownership has proven wisest, although divided ownership was attempted to be inaugurated in Rome and Egypt under their foolish agrarian laws, but upon a different principle from the single tax; but in Rome, as would the single-tax provision here, it caused diminution in production, high cost of living, and deterioration of farm interests. As I stated a while ago, even the Socialists would not advocate this principle.

I have in my study of policies and measures best suited to civilization—and I think I have studied the land problem in every light of which it is capable—come to the conclusion that either you must have an absolute and complete ownership or else no ownership, as the Socialists propose. There is no middle ground between these two.

EVILS INCIDENT TO OWNERSHIP.

I will agree with you that there are evils growing out of and incident to private ownership. They are these four:

First. The evil of absentee landlordism, or "alien ownership," which can be prevented by an alien land law as we have in the Oklahoma constitution.

Second. The evil of "corporate ownership," which we have also corrected by prohibiting the ownership of land by any corporation except that necessary to operate its business. No corporation ought to be permitted to own land not necessary for the operation of its business, whether it be a farm or a coal mine, and in the last instance there is a double reason, because the ownership of the product combined with a carrier doubles their power for monopoly.

Third. There is the evil of "excessive ownership," that ownership of more than a reasonable share. This may be reached by a graduated tax; and there is coming a time, it may be remote, but surely, when land will become as scarce here as it is in China and Japan; then that will be adopted.

One of the best means of breaking up large holdings is to increase intensive culture, improved and scientific methods, because under such knowledge and methods, when universally known among all producers, the man with "broad acres" under a tenant system can not survive the competition against the small home owner under intensive and scientific culture. It is by this means that China has avoided the large landed estates. The largest farm in all China is owned by Mrs. Wu and consists of 25 acres.

Fourth. "Uncertainty of ownership," and the fact that there is growing up an evil of uncertain ownership demonstrates the importance of complete ownership. I mean the inability ofttimes to discover to whom it belongs, and this discourages the sale of small tracts of land, where transfers have been made during a century for the cost of the abstract, and determination of title ofttimes costs more than the original parcel of land, until it becomes bunglesome, expensive, and often the lawyer's opinion about the title when he passed upon the abstract may be good or it may not be worth the paper it is written on. That evil could be stopped by the adoption by the several States of the Torrens land-registration system, that makes the transfer easy and simple, not requiring the technical knowledge of the lawyer to tell what the title is, whether in fee simple, a lease, or a mortgage. The certificate would show at all times every phase of the title, so that fraud could not be perpetrated.

There is another evil that tends to create tenant conditions and that is the land policy—almost uniform in the various States—partly growing out of the taxing power. For instance the man who buys a farm worth, say, $1,000 on a credit, paying $100 down, neither the land nor the mortgage can be hid from taxation, but the States almost uniformly tax the mortgage to the extent of the unpaid amount of $900, which is really the property owned by the mortgagee, and then in turn taxes the occupant of the land $1,000, or its full valuation, when as a matter of truth he owns no more than $100. If the law in effect could be changed so as to tax that man all he owned in the land, increasing it only as he increased the payment, until he paid it all, there would not be this double taxation tending to discourage credit sales. In order that the poor homeless man may buy a home you must encourage credit sales on long time. But the policy of the several States discourages it. The man who has made but part payment can not bear the expense of paying taxes on property many times more than he really owns.

Yes; I believe in permitting the tenant farmers, and the tenants only, to take up the remaining public land for homestead. I believe in changing the law, and particularly the law that tends to discourage credit sales, and I certainly favor a rural-credit system that will give the homeless man an opportunity to buy a home on long time at the lowest possible rate of interest. This done and in a generation tenant conditions in this country would not be a threatening menace or constitute an evil. I believe in absolute private ownership of land so the occupant of the soil will have an interest in keeping it up, preserving the fertility, and prevent its washing away, and the power of transmitting it to his children. These things he will preserve if he is given that reward, but if the State is to be rewarded with the "increment" he will not do it.

DIMINISHING RETURNS.

Just a word more about the question of production and the fostering care of the Government with reference to farm lands. There was a political economist some two centuries ago by the name of Malthus, who, at that time like some of our impractical men of to-day, believed even then that the world had reached a stage when there would be no more war; and upon this basis he taught the doctrine that the time would come in the world when the world could not feed the world, basing it upon universal peace. This doctrine would have been true if his premise had been true, to wit, universal peace; because population grows by geometrical ratio, while production increases by arithmetical ratio. But experience has demonstrated that universal peace can not be expected, for just as many in the United States sought to make us believe that universal peace had come the most dreadful war in all history broke out in Europe. Prof. Malthus based in part this doctrine upon another doctrine, which in effect has been confirmed by Adam Smith and Ricardo, but by different methods, which is known as the doctrine of "diminishing returns" of agriculture. There seems to be no scientific reason for this doctrine, nevertheless it has too many times proven true. This doctrine is that the returns from the soil or agricultural lands increases in the proportion of the increase in population, until the population of the country reaches the limit of the land under existing methods of production to feed that population; and then thereafter there is a corresponding diminishing return or a diminution in production from the soil in proportion to the further increase of population. That doctrine has been demonstrated in our own country as well as many other countries in the world. Many of our eastern States do not produce as much as they used to produce. There is a reason for this, and that reason is found in this fact, that wherever the soil will not feed a population and give them all employment, with only normal or necessary manufacturing industry, the population turns its mind from agriculture and compels its lawgivers to put all governmental fostering care into industries and manufacturing plants finally, to the total neglect of farm production until it grows to such diminution that it is thought not worth considering at all at the hands of the State.

A State or nation reaching this period of its history will too often fight in legislative bodies the best interest of themselves as well as agriculture. They seem not to realize that of first consideration is farming or food production, because through this means the people are fed. All of their statesmanship and governmental policy are centered around labor in the industrial field. It may be observed that in the beginning of this Republic every tariff and banking law and every other statute of the Government was written with a view of promoting agriculture. Even Jefferson believed in protection for raw materials in order to encourage production, and indeed every tariff law up until the Civil War placed the protective duty upon raw cotton, but for the past 40 years, owing to the diminution of agriculture in certain sections, and the consequent increase in industry and manufacturing whose forces have controlled the powers of National Government, that policy has been entirely reversed until now even the old Democratic Party has turned away from production and its fostering care of agriculture, particularly in its tariff laws, by planting itself some 16 years ago squarely upon the doctrine of free raw material—the products of the farmer.

I might go in further detail on this, but that is another question aside from the one up for discussion. Some years ago I had occasion to spend my entire time, for more than five years, upon the study of the constitutions and charters of governments and the history of the making of them. In the midst of that study I made what to me became a very important discovery. I discovered that every Government in the world that had existed sufficiently long to have a place in history had been moved by two forces, the one to promote the spiritual man, the other the physical man. One existed either upon its religion, or the philosophy of its religion, and the other upon agriculture. I fully believe, woe is the nation whose people abandon either religion or agriculture.

"Civilization begins and ends with the plow," says the Alcalde. This discovery forced me into a study of agriculture, not only of the "philosophy of the plow" but the practical science of natural production, and with the same effort I studied the morals and dogmas of the great religions of the world in an effort to distinguish the difference in them and their effect upon society. I confess I was astonished to find that all except Mohammedanism—Mohammedanism was purely the production of a faker—the other five great religions had many points of close contact, and it may seem strange to some to hear that we have a religious hymn entitled "Vital Spark of Heavenly Flame," now sung in Christian churches, but written nearly 2,000 years ago by a pagan by the name of Hadrian, who opposed Christianity, and yet the principle of his creed was so nearly that of Christianity that both can sing and worship with the same hymn. In many points these religions are closer together than are the creeds and dogmas of some of the sects professing Christianity and much less hatred and ill feeling growing out of their difference. Most men read the history of their particular church and the books abusing the other man's church, so that religious strife and intolerance of religious belief is rife again in the land, engendering hatred and superstition, to the great detriment of society and the progress of mankind. But this is another question.

Permit me, however, further to digress long enough to refer to one thing in the early history of Christianity. Pliny the Younger, who was born 62 years after Christ, and whose name will live so long as Christianity endures because of his having written the only description now extant of personal contact with the teachings and privations, together with their trials under the Roman law, of the Christians during the first century. As prætor, or provisional governor, it became his duty to bring about the trial under the Roman law of these Christians, and we have preserved to us a letter of his to Trajan in which he describes their obstinate refusal to deny their faith, and the striking part about it all was that the Christians themselves declared that—they met on a stated day before daybreak and addressed a form of a prayer to Christ as to a divinity, binding themselves by a solemn oath, not for any wicked purpose, but never to commit fraud, theft, or adultery; never to break their word or to deny a trust when called on to deliver it up; after which it was their custom to separate and then reassemble and to eat together a harmless meal.

I fear the practices of these primitive Christian worshipers have to some extent been departed from. But this is altogether another question. Let us return to the single tax.

After a government has reached a population to the limit of the soil to feed there is but one way to increase the production, and that is by a better knowledge of the laws of soil, of plant life—the knowledge of growing two plants where one grew before—and we are now approaching that period. We suffer more by a lack of that knowledge than any other cause. The old philosopher of China, Tua-yang-hi, founded a religion in order to make agriculture the prime importance of the State, destroyed all of the books except those of the science of agriculture and of medicine, so that the Chinaman would be forced by his religion to hold as a governmental policy to agriculture. That religion gave him a superstition against digging in the dirt, such as mining, and there was none there until the German concessions a few years ago. The preservation of their books on agriculture gave them that science for 6,000 years, which the white race lost during the Dark Ages. Their system of wage was founded at a cheap price in order to hold down the development of manufacturing industry to the normal supply of an agricultural people, so that for 6,000 years they have fed that tremendous population, equaling one-fourth of the people of the earth, by agriculture alone, notwithstanding in the country precincts there are now more than 4,000 people to every square mile. This was made possible only by the continued fostering care of the Government, by a concentration of mind of both people and statesmen and by a knowledge, universal among the people, of the laws of production and of plant life, impelled on and on by their religion. That population would have broken up centuries ago if they had abandoned that policy, because production would have been insufficient to feed the people. I call attention to the history of all agricultural nations and challenge any man to put his finger on any agricultural nation in all the history of man that perished because of any inward evil. All such nations founded their land tenure upon complete and absolute private ownerships. Such nations gave us the Bible. The moral philosophy of the Proverbs and Psalms of the Old Testament was written and handed down to us by the sheep herders of Palestine.

I would not be understood as saying that an industrial nation should have no manufacturing industries. There is a normal degree essential to them and to every state of society. I am trying to point out the tendency toward overfostering of such industries and the dangers arising therefrom, not only in its effect upon society by reducing production, but in the policies and thoughts of the people.

If agricultural nations have survived all internal troubles and only perished as they have by external aggression, such as foreign military subjugation, what are the evils, and what have been the evils of civilization in the past? The real evil of present-day civilization, as it has been in all the past, is the evil of laborism. What I mean by laborism is not organization. Without organization they would become abject slaves. But it is that element always present in the labor movements of the past, and too often becoming the dominant power of the organization in spite of its wiser counsel, which seeks to create uniformity of condition of wage, equality of wage, without regard to the earning capacity. The only standard of wage is its ability to create. No one ought to blame labor for organizing or for demanding all which the traffic will bear, but the earning capacity of each, particularly in different grades and fields, is necessarily unequal, and if you do not reward skill, knowledge of how to perform the job, and knowledge that works for increased capacity you will diminish all incentive for skill and improvement and consequently increase the unskilled and ignorant laborer, which in turn becomes dangerous, not only as it affects its own welfare but in the movement of civilization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, the committee has no authority to extend the time, the House having fixed the time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I was about to continue to say that when a labor movement becomes dominated by this principle it reacts upon general society and upon the governmental power equally disastrous to all. From a standpoint of practical politics it may be unwise to say this because of a possibility of misunderstanding of my meaning and the room it gives for misconstruction by persons who may desire to misconstrue it. Nevertheless it is the truth. Happy is the government that gives reward for effort, and that reward must be extended to labor improvement as well as to every other field of endeavor, otherwise society would sink to the lowest depths through indulgence and lack of effort and self-denial. Hence the diminution in skilled labor and labor intelligence works a corresponding increase of the unskilled and ignorant labor, and in turn ignorance controls the policy of the government and wrecks it, as it has many Governments of the past. To say our Government will never perish is but hoping against the experience of the past and the decrees of nature all about us—death follows life and life precedes death, death is the end of all living things, or at least has proven true whether applied to the animal or the vegetable kingdom, to civilization or the life of a nation. This Nation has grown too far toward an industrial nation and has been too neglectful of agricultural interests. I do not say this because of the appeal of the farmer himself, but in the interest of the whole population; in the interest of the lower cost of living, in order that the expense of living may be lowered that the people may not suffer thereby. What is the remedy for the evils growing out of the ownership of land and indirectly the evils of society? The real remedy lies in this: Let the States change their policies in line with the above suggestions; inaugurate a general policy to encourage credit sales of real estate. Do this not only in the interest of the farmer but for yourselves, for civilization, for the Republic. Do this and you will make 2,000,000 more homes happy. You will destroy tenant conditions as an evil, you will strengthen the moral forces of the Republic, remove much of the misery, poverty, suffering, and want. Push the work of the Agricultural Department of Government, both State and National, in their effort to increase the knowledge of soils and of production leading to the adoption of better methods. Let the Government adopt a rural credit system enabling the tenant farmer to pay for a home on long time at the lowest rate of interest; return to that fostering care of governmental policy in aid of farming as of first importance to society. This will not wholly abolish poverty, but will make more equal the distribution of wealth; it will reduce the cost of living, removing misery among the poor, placing the homeless in a position of plenty rather than that of want; raise the standard of morals and integrity, and the life of the Republic will be prolonged to that remote day when Divine Providence shall decree its end. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that he has 25 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] 39 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for 25 minutes.

[Mr. SISSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the time remaining to my credit to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] is recognized for 34 minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, the question of how to provide funds necessary to run the Government machinery must always be a perplexing problem to the legislator. No matter by what system taxation is levied, it is sure to bear heavily on many individuals reached by it, and it should be the aim to make the taxes as equitable as possible and to impose the least possible burden or annoyance upon the taxpayer.

While admitting that the perfect taxing system has yet to be devised, it seems to me that to any unprejudiced person familiar with the usual methods of taxation for the support of the Federal Government the forms of taxation inaugurated by the present administration make simply a hodgepodge of disconnected, ill-considered provisions that hardly deserve the name of a taxing system.

It would seem that the mere suggestion of the annoyances and the burdens of some forms of taxation under the so-called war-revenue act ought to have been sufficient to cause them to be rejected by those who are responsible for that act. For example, our Government is not in such dire straits as to make it necessary for every citizen, when he sends a telegram or telephone message, to dig up 1 cent for the Government. When he is obliged to do this it fills him with disgust, and the language that he uses, in most cases, and applies to the legislators who invented this form of annoyance would be unprintable. When a citizen of the United States who borrows money gives his note therefor it is an indication of his necessity, and to add to this necessity by taxing him in addition 2 cents for each hundred dollars or fraction thereof is as inequitable and burdensome as it is unnecessary.

The 1-cent stamp tax required upon bills of lading by the act of October 22, 1914, and other stamp provisions of that law belong in the same class as those above referred to. They are annoying, petty, and wholly indefensible.

What motive or consideration could have moved the Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee of the House to incorporate provisions of this kind in the act of October 22, 1914, is beyond my comprehension. If the existence of the Government were at stake, of course our people would submit to these forms of annoying taxation with perfect good feeling, but when they are levied to correct the errors of an imperfect and inadequate tariff act—and most of the citizens of the United States are coming to understand this—they have very little patience with them.

And now it is proposed, as we understand it, to supplement these onerous, annoying direct taxes by other forms of direct taxation, notwithstanding that there is coming into the country annually foreign-made goods to the value of $1,750,000,000, 65 per cent of which are admitted free of duty.

Not only was the free list greatly enlarged by the Underwood Act, but many of the duties provided by the tariff act of 1909 were greatly reduced. If those responsible for legislation here would consent to restore a part of the provisions of the much-abused act of 1909, the present deficit and that that is threatened for the future would be wiped out, and the money necessary to provide for any reasonable program of preparedness which the majority might propose would easily be provided for, not only without resorting to further direct taxation, but many of the direct taxes now in force might be dispensed with; and, after a careful study of the effect of the Underwood Act, I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that this could be done without increasing the cost to the ultimate consumer of the products affected by the tariff by so much as one cent.

It is not my purpose to enter into any defense of the tariff act of 1909. It had some inequalities and iniquities which should never have been in it, but it at least produced the revenue necessary to carry on the Government and produced a liberal surplus in the Treasury as well.

I desire now to refer to specific cases of imports affected by the two acts to demonstrate the truth of what I say—that in most cases the Underwood Act, while reducing the tariff or placing the articles on the free list, did not reduce the price of these articles to the consumer. The reduction in the tariff was in almost every instance pocketed by the importer of the foreign-made goods and the American consumer never got any good from it whatever, and the Government, of course, lost the revenue.

I will first relate a little of my own personal experience to demonstrate this. I belong to a company of gentlemen who have to buy annually a car of cyanide of sodium to extract gold from quartz ores. This cyanide, up to the beginning of the present war in Europe, was mostly imported from Germany. Under the act of 1909 the tariff on cyanide of sodium was 3 cents a pound plus 25 per cent ad valorem. The Underwood Act reduced this tariff by taking off the specific duty of 3 cents per pound and imposing only a 25 per cent ad valorem tax. If there was anything in the contention that the reduction of this tariff would redound to the benefit of the purchasers of cyanide in this country, we should have bought our cyanide 3 cents per pound cheaper in 1913 and 1914 than we had been buying it. When we came to buy our cyanide in the spring of 1914—this was before the war—we suggested to those from whom we had been buying it theretofore that we ought to buy it, on account of the tariff reduction, 3 cents per pound cheaper than the year before. They took it up with the German importers, but were advised by them that there would be no reduction in the price. The price remained at 22 cents a pound f. o. b. New York as theretofore. This 3 cents per pound therefore did not redound to our benefit, but to the benefit of the German manufacturer and importer, who added it to their price and put it in their own pockets.

Again, let us take some of the articles produced largely, if not entirely, in California and see what the effect upon the consumer of the reduction of the tariff by the Underwood bill was. Take, for instance, the various kinds of nuts that are imported, most or all of which are raised in California—almonds, walnuts, and so forth. The tariff of 1909 imposed a duty on shelled almonds of 6 cents per pound and on unshelled of 4 cents; the Underwood tariff reduced this duty on shelled almonds to 4 cents and on unshelled to 3 cents. I find the annual loss in tariff on almonds imported in 1915 to be $231,736. On walnuts the Payne Act imposed a duty of 5 cents on shelled and of 3 cents on unshelled nuts. The Underwood Act reduced this 1 cent a pound, and I find the loss in duty on these walnuts for 1915 to be $197,972. Now, would anyone contend that almonds or walnuts or any other of the nuts—filberts, peanuts, and so forth—affected by this tariff were in any instance sold to the consumer at a less price than before the Underwood tariff went into effect?

Referring to the wholesale price list for the latter part of 1913 and the first half of 1914 I discover that there was no reduction in price in these articles as a result of this reduction in the tariff.

Again, take the item of olive oil, which is in this country produced alone in California. The act of 1909 levied a tax of 40 cents a gallon on oil in bulk and 50 cents a gallon on that in bottles, kegs, tins, and so forth, containing less than 5 gallons, and the Underwood Act imposed a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem. I find the loss in revenue for 1915, even estimating the imports at the lower figure of 40 cents a gallon, to be $998,596.

Referring now to the table of wholesale prices printed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, I find that instead of there being a reduction in price in the latter part of 1913 and the first half of 1914 there was actually an increase in the wholesale price of olive oil. This was, of course, before the beginning of the war.

Again, let us take lemons, also produced largely in California. The Underwood Act reduced lemons from 1½ cents per pound to one-half cent per pound. I find it a little difficult to ascertain the exact amount of loss on the lemons imported into this country in 1915, since the pounds imported are not given, but it is, in round numbers, at least $2,000,000; yet I venture to say that lemons did not reach the consumer any cheaper in 1914 prior to the beginning of the war than they did in 1912 under the Payne bill. Of course, since the war, the Italian market having been greatly circumscribed by the war reducing or cutting off the demand, great quantities of lemons were last year dumped on our market, and the wholesale price went off, and perhaps in some cases consumers may have bought their lemons cheaper than in 1912 and the early part of 1913, but this was primarily because of the war shutting off the Italian from German, Austrian, and other markets and making it necessary for him to flood the markets of this country with his products, and the reduction in price was not wholly caused by the reduction in the tariff.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What effect has taking the duty off of these citrous fruits in California had on the planting of those fruit trees out in that country?

Mr. HAYES. It has entirely stopped the planting, and it has produced most disastrous results to the citrous orchardists of California, which I shall speak of and give some concrete instances of the results.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We will probably be paying much more for imported fruits later on than we have heretofore been paying for California fruits?

Mr. HAYES. Absolutely. There is no question about it. Again, take the item of rice. We produce quite a large quantity of rice in California, but the rice produced in this country comes so very far from being sufficient to supply the demand that it would seem that if there is any virtue in the contention that the reduction of the tariff would redound to the benefit of the consumer, it should be in such a considerable commodity as rice. The act of 1909 imposed a duty on rice, as follows:

Rice, cleaned, 2 cents per pound; uncleaned rice, or rice free of the outer hull and still having the inner cuticle on, 1¼ cents per pound; rice flour, and rice meal, and rice broken, which will pass through a No. 12 wire sieve of a kind prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; paddy, or rice having the outer hull on, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound.

The act of 1913, or the Underwood tariff bill, reduces this duty, as follows:

Rice, cleaned, 1 cent per pound; uncleaned rice, or rice free of the outer hull and still having the inner cuticle on, five-eighths of 1 cent per pound; rice flour, and rice meal, and rice broken, which will pass through a No. 12 sieve of a kind prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; paddy, or rice having the outer hull on, three-eighths of 1 cent per pound.

I find that by this reduction the Government lost in revenue, in 1915, $2,128,220. Yet in spite of this reduction there was absolutely no diminution in the price of rice to the consumer or to the wholesaler in the latter part of 1913 and the first half of 1914. In other words, this $2,128,220 did not benefit the consumers of rice in this country one cent. It simply went into the pockets of the importers of rice instead of into the Treasury of the United States.

The tariff act of 1913—the Underwood bill—reduced the duty on sugar something more than 20 per cent. The loss of revenue on the importation for 1915 aggregated the sum of $15,463,364. Probably no one will claim that this reduction in the tariff reduced the price of sugar to anybody. In fact, almost immediately after the act of 1913 went into effect, in March, 1914, the price of sugar advanced, and the price has been continuously since that date higher than before the passage of the Underwood Act.

Unmanufactured wool was subject to a duty of from 7 to 11 cents a pound under the Payne Act and is free under the present law. The loss by this tariff change I find to be $40,760,960 for 1915; the reduction of the tariff on manufactures of wool produced a net loss to the Treasury of $9,357,216, making a total loss to the Treasury in 1915 on account of the reduction of the tariff on wool and the manufactures of wool, in round numbers, of $50,000,000.

I find, on consulting the tables of prices printed by the Government, that as a result of this reduction in duty there has been no reduction in price of the manufactured article to the ultimate consumer except in one or two kinds of suitings manufactured from wool. Blankets, underwear, and every other article of wearing apparel used by our people either remained the same in price or has advanced.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I will.

Mr. BLACK. If that is the result of the workings of the Underwood tariff law—and the gentleman, I understand, is a protectionist—of what is the gentleman complaining?

Mr. HAYES. I will show the gentleman of what I am complaining. I am complaining that the money goes into the pocket of the importer instead of into the Treasury of the United States; and the gentleman's party, to make up that loss, is taxing our people by direct taxation.

Mr. BLACK. Did not the gentleman state the prices of these goods in this country have not been reduced?

Mr. HAYES. I did; and it is a fact.

Mr. BLACK. In what way is the laboring industry injured, if the prices still remain as high?

Mr. HAYES. I am speaking for all the people of the United States, and I say it is better to tax the foreigner when he seeks our market, and make him pay for running the Government, than it is to put a direct tax upon the citizens of the United States for that purpose. That is what I am contending for. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This list could be greatly extended, and in almost every case the actual wholesale prices demonstrate that the reduction of the tariff duties in each case, so far from resulting in any saving to the consumer of those articles in this country, has in many cases actually resulted in an increase of price.

I have arrived at the loss of revenue in each case by taking the imports for the first nine months of the calendar year of 1915, actual figures for which only were available when these figures were made up, and estimating for the balance of the year. I have also gone upon the supposition that the imposition of higher duties would not diminish the amount of imports of the various articles. In some few cases it is likely that higher duties would reduce the amount of imports, but in most cases, as for example in the case of sugar, rice, wool, and so forth, there would be no diminution of importations.

I am appending hereto a table showing the amount of imports for 1915 of many articles with the estimated loss of revenue on these articles for that year resulting from the decrease in tariff schedules, from which it appears that the resulting loss on these enumerated articles amounts in round numbers to $125,000,000. I therefore beg to suggest to those Members of the House upon the other side of the Chamber, charged with the duty of raising the revenue for the conduct of the affairs of the Government, that the only thing that will be necessary to replace the present deficit with a Treasury surplus and to provide the money necessary to pay for any increase in the Army and Navy that may be decided upon is to repeal the Underwood Tariff Act and to reenact many of the provisions of the last tariff act passed by a Republican Congress; and I make the assertion without fear of successful contradiction, that this can be accomplished without increasing the cost of the commodities consumed by our people by a single dollar.

It is strange that loyalty to a political shibboleth should so blind men of intelligence to facts which can be easily discovered by any student of this subject. If there ever was much truth in the statement that the tariff on imports was added to the price of the imported article and charged up to the consumer thereof who had to pay it, in these modern days there is in most cases no foundation whatever for such a statement. The existence of worldwide trusts and the combination between manufacturers in every country of most commodities make it certain that the price generally will be controlled outside of any law that the United States may pass in a way to realize in each of the markets of the world the most possible for the producers of these commodities. When an importer desires to enter our markets he must, of course, meet the local competition, and in order to do so he must meet the price of our local producers. It therefore follows—and an examination of the figures published by the Government on prices of various commodities demonstrates—that the importer must in almost every case pay the tariff, and can not and does not charge it up to the purchaser of the articles. In cases where there is no production of an article in this country this may not be true, but there are so few commodities now not produced here as to make this possible contrary result negligible.

California, according to the latest census figures, produces almost the entire crop of lemons and olives in the United States, as well as three-fourths of the orange and prune crops, one-third of the nut crop, two-thirds of the fig crop, and other semi-tropical products in like proportion. And what has this beneficent Underwood Act done for these industries of California? At least one of them has been greatly injured. I shall, by a specific example, which might be multiplied by hundreds of others, show you how it has injured the farmer and orchardist without helping either consumer or Government.

The case I cite is that of a man whose 3 acres of lemons produced a crop of 16 tons per acre and, with his orange grove, gave him an income ample for his needs under the protective tariff of 1909. The Underwood Act, reducing the tariff on lemons, permitted the country to be flooded with the foreign-grown product, and 18 tons of his lemons, shipped East for disposal in 1915, returned him only $61.60, leaving him to foot the year's bills for irrigation, cultivation, picking, packing, and incidental expenses, while from other shipments the returns did not even pay the freight.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAYES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. The question I just wanted to ask was this, I understand from the statement the gentleman has just made that his lemon grower was driven out of business because the country was flooded with importations under the Underwood Tariff Act.

Mr. HAYES. I so state.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman also stated a while ago, in his remarks, that the prices of lemons were not any cheaper.

Mr. HAYES. I did not state that.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the gentleman to so state, that prior to the European war there was no reduction in the price of lemons.

Mr. HAYES. I did so state.

Mr. BLACK. Then, how could the gentleman contend that his lemon grower was driven out of business by competition when they did not bring about any lower price?

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman will readily understand that the war was on last year and I explained that owing to the cutting off of the German, Austrian, and other markets of Europe, it was for the interest of the Italian to dump his lemons on this market without reference to the demand here, and there being no tariff to speak of on lemons, he could do this, and our people in California could not compete with him. In other words, when the conditions abroad are normal as effecting any imported commodity it is for the interest of the importer to maintain the price and get out of it all that he can; but when conditions abroad are abnormal and it becomes to his interest to dump his product upon our market, without any reference to the demand here, the absence of a protective tariff permits him to do this, and his cost of production being so much less than ours our people are driven from the field. Now, it may not be known to the gentleman that lemons usually can be introduced into this country from Europe and landed in Washington at from 25 to 30 cents a box, the entire carrying charges.

It costs the people of California 85 cents a box to ship lemons to the Missouri River, to say nothing of the expense of producing them in California above the cost of production in Italy.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I was in California last August, and I was told that at Fresno, Cal., under the shade of the lemon trees there, Sicilian lemons, imported from Italy, were sold at 5 cents a dozen, and at Los Angeles I myself bought them at that price.

Mr. HAYES. I have not the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman contend that under the present shipping facilities you can ship lemons from Italy to Washington, D. C., at 25 cents a box?

Mr. HAYES. You could not, perhaps, just now; but last summer you could. I do not know exactly what the price is now. I have not investigated freight rates recently. But the point I am trying to make is this, that it would be better to tax these lemon importers a good liberal sum—two or three or five million dollars in the aggregate, whatever it amounts to—and put that money in the Treasury of the United States rather than let them come here and have our markets free and destroy the industry in the State of California. Does not the gentleman agree to that proposition? I believe he does, as I believe every other thinking gentleman does.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HAYES. I do.

Mr. KITCHIN. This lemon-industry question is a very interesting one. We had a little informal hearing, a few of us, the other day in regard to this subject. I want to ask the gentleman, is it not a fact that the lemon crop last year was perhaps 30 to 50 per cent larger than ever before?

Mr. HAYES. It was larger than the year before, but I think it was not so large as it was one year, some three years ago. I think that we have raised larger crops of lemons in California than that of last year, but offhand I can not tell the gentleman just what year it was.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is it not a fact that no more lemons come in under the Underwood Tariff Act than under the Payne-Aldrich Act?

Mr. HAYES. That is not the fact; but I have not the exact figures, as the department has no figures of the weight of importations since October, 1913.

The Republican Party believes that it is better to collect from the foreign producer and importer in the form of a tariff on imports a large proportion of the revenue necessary to run the Government rather than to collect this revenue from our own citizens by any form of direct taxation. If wisely carried out, one of the beneficent results of this policy is to protect our own people from the ruinous competition of imported products made by cheap foreign labor. To this doctrine of the Republican Party I subscribe with all my heart, and the more I study this great subject the more certain I am that its position on this great question is absolutely sound. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HAYES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a certain table which I have prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12207—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BRITT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one day, Wednesday, March 1, on account of important public business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating article contained in the Scientific American of date February 26, 1916, concerning traffic on the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article from the Scientific American of February 26 concerning traffic on the Mississippi River. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question that I discussed this afternoon—the single tax.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the single tax. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have half an hour next Friday, after the reading of the Journal, to address the House on the subject of national honor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he have half an hour in which to address the House on the subject of national honor. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the committees are all at work now, and nearly every committee is in general debate, and I presume Friday will be pension day, and there will be plenty of opportunity to speak upon the subject in which the gentleman is interested during the consideration of that bill without making a special order.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have been rather modest? I have not talked for a whole month, and that is rather a trying exercise of self-denial for a Socialist. I ask for an opportunity to talk for half an hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object to that on account of the fact that every day when there is general debate there is opportunity for such remarks during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Which bill?

Mr. MADDEN. All the bills.

Mr. LONDON. You talk on the tariff and on all sorts of political chestnuts.

The SPEAKER. When the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in general debate, a Member has the right to talk about anything under the shining sun.

Mr. LONDON. I want to get the opportunity as a matter of orderly procedure.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, March 1, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, of this date, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $10,000 for improvement of the Hot Springs Reservation (H. Doc. No. 807); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from Col. William W. Harts, United States Army, executive and disbursing officer of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, submitting a request for the reappropriation of any balance of the appropriation of $5,000 made in the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1915, for the survey and map for the connecting parkway between Rock Creek and Potomac Parks, which may remain unexpended on June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 808); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 25, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fall	Johnson, Me.	Norris
Beckham	Gallinger	Johnson, S. Dak.	O'Gorman
Brandegee	Gore	Jones	Oliver
Catron	Gronna	Kern	Overman
Chamberlain	Harding	Lane	Page
Clark, Wyo.	Hardwick	Lippitt	Phelan
Culberson	Hitchcock	Lodge	Poindexter
Cummins	Hollis	Martin, Va.	Pomerene
Curtis	Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Ransdell
Dillingham	Husting	Myers	Robinson
du Pont	James	Nelson	Shafroth
Sheppard	Smith, Md.	Stone	Underwood
Sherman	Smith, Mich.	Swanson	Vardaman
Shields	Smith, S. C.	Thomas	Wadsworth
Simmons	Smoot	Thompson	Warren
Smith, Ga.	Sterling	Townsend

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who are attending a committee hearing upon the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on official business.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on account of illness; also the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I desire to have the proposed agreement read which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of March 2, 1916 (Thursday), the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 3331 through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask unanimous consent that that agreement may be entered into.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection among the Senators present?

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether the bill is to be held before the Senate for consideration continuously from now until the time named in the proposed agreement?

Mr. SHIELDS. It will be my effort to hold it before the Senate, and I know of nothing——

Mr. CUMMINS. But I mean to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. SHIELDS. I know of nothing to the contrary.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if we could not modify the request? As far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to commence right now and limit the time any Senator can talk to 15 minutes, and limit any speech he may make to one on each amendment, and let the debate run out in that way. I do not want to delay the final vote. I would dislike at this time to agree to a unanimous consent for to-morrow that might prevent debate on some of the most important amendments—one, at least—of any that have been offered. The time might be used upon amendments not so important. However, I would be perfectly willing that the speeches should be limited. There are some amendments to be offered that one could not do justice to in five minutes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should suppose that all those could be disposed of in the days we would have.

Mr. NORRIS. I am inclined to think they can, but I dislike to make an agreement in advance that might preclude such consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is offering one of those amendments, and certainly he could bring it up before the debate is limited.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I will be ready to offer one amendment of importance. I wanted to offer it yesterday, and it was put over at his request, to accommodate him.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is correct. The same question is substantially involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I thought it best to dispose of them, if we can, all together and have the argument made.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not exactly the same question involved in the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHIELDS. Would the Senator agree for the next day, then, at, say, 3 o'clock?

Mr. NORRIS. On Friday?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Leaving it just as it stands, except Friday instead of Thursday?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe I would object to that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then let the agreement be modified so as to say Friday instead of Thursday.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree to that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will put up the hour a little. Let it be 3 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, as I listened to the reading of the proposition it does not mean that we shall vote at that time, but that is the time when the limitation of debate will come in.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; the voting would begin.

Mr. NORRIS. You can leave it at 4 o'clock, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHIELDS. Very well; I agree to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, those of us who have taken no part in this debate were somewhat surprised that those who have given it so much time should object to the proposition the Senator from Tennessee has made. The Senator from Tennessee has been most courteous and kindly and has facilitated the consideration of the bill as much as he could. I do hope that any reasonable proposition the Senator from Tennessee makes will not be objected to by anyone and that we will be able to facilitate the progress of legislation with a view to taking up other important matters in the near future.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assume, as a part of the agreement, that the bill shall remain under consideration to the exclusion of all other business until it is disposed of.

Mr. SHIELDS. I know of no disposition to do otherwise.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I want to add that as a part of the agreement.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will resist any displacement of this measure for any purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There should be no question about this matter at all. Just a moment. The Chair will read the rule.

Mr. SHIELDS. The unanimous-consent agreement settles that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to read the rule, which will settle, or ought to settle, the question, at least:

3. No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present; and when a unanimous consent is thus given the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

It does not seem possible, if this agreement is entered into, that it can be set aside save by unanimous consent and upon one day's notice.

Mr. SMOOT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The question that was in my mind was whether the understanding that the Senate shall continue with the consideration of the bill from this time until a vote is reached under these terms is a part of the agreement. If it is, I know that it can not be set aside except by another unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will now so rule, and if anyone wants to appeal now is a good time to appeal from the ruling of the Chair. It is all one unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. When he says the bill is to be kept before the Senate to the exclusion of all other business, of course that does not mean to cut out the morning hour in case the Senate should adjourn instead of taking a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not sufficiently informed of the rules to state whether it would require that to be done or not. I am not anxious to cut out the morning hour. How does the Senator from Iowa understand that?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have been doing without a morning hour for some time, and we can certainly do without a morning hour for another day or two until we dispose of the bill. I have no disposition to delay it; I want to vote upon it; but there are two or three amendments upon which I desire to speak for a few moments, and I do not intend to be cut out if I can help it. There are very many amendments to be offered.

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, I take it from the agreement proposed by the Senator from Tennessee the Senate will proceed in its usual parliamentary way, and if we take an adjournment of course the morning hour would be had and routine business would be transacted in the morning hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, except that by unanimous consent or upon motion, we should proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. JAMES. I understand that, but I want it understood that the unanimous-consent agreement should not cut out the morning hour in case the Senate adjourns.

Mr. KERN. Certainly not.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will not object to this unanimous-consent agreement if it is made for to-morrow, but if it is postponed after to-morrow and involves a continued recess I shall be constrained to object to it.

I think, Mr. President, that we owe it to ourselves and to the public to have at least one day on which routine business can be transacted between the hours of 12 and 2. If it is understood that we can have that to-morrow or even on Friday, I shall make no objection, but to have this bill kept before the Senate to the exclusion of other business that is of importance and which ought to be transacted at some time in the morning hour I think is asking too much.

I am perfectly willing to withdraw any objection I may have, provided it is understood that, say, on Friday we will devote the regular two hours to morning business.

Mr. KERN. Either Thursday or Friday.

Mr. SHIELDS. On Friday.

Mr. OLIVER. Either Thursday or Friday.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think Friday would be the best.

Mr. OLIVER. Such part of the two hours as may be necessary. I do not mean that it must cover two hours necessarily.

Mr. SHIELDS. The modification for a morning hour on one of those days would be agreeable to me, if it is to other Senators.

Mr. JAMES. Can a unanimous-consent agreement be made that would prevent the Senate from adjourning?

Mr. KERN and Mr. GALLINGER. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion—and action may be taken in accordance with the opinion of the Chair, or an appeal may even be had—the Chair is of the opinion that the Senate is now in recess and has been in recess; that the pending business before the Senate is Senate bill 3331; and in accordance with this unanimous-consent agreement it will remain continuously before the Senate, and can only be set aside by a unanimous-consent agreement, after one day's notice thereof, unless the Senate should adjourn, in which event the morning hour would intervene, and would set aside for that purpose this unanimous-consent agreement until the unfinished business was again taken up. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JAMES. That is my understanding of the rules.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I would suggest that this unanimous-consent agreement go through, with the understanding that to-morrow, at the close of to-morrow's business, there will be an adjournment instead of a recess.

Mr. SHIELDS. That will be entirely agreeable, and I will accept that modification if it meets the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, we adjourn to-night for a morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. KERN. That was not the suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. To adjourn to-morrow and have a morning hour on Friday morning?

Mr. SHIELDS. On Friday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order that there may be no future difficulty, the Chair desires to say that the Chair understands that it is not only the opinion of the Chair but also of the Senate that there will be upon to-morrow an adjournment to Friday, and that the morning hour on Friday will intervene in this unanimous-consent agreement. The Secretary will now call the roll.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, before the roll is called, I want to say that I have introduced a substitute amendment for the pending bill, and I should like to have a couple of hours to present it between now and next Friday. I have also one or two other smaller amendments which I desire to offer. I have no disposition to hold up the consideration of this bill, and yet I dislike to forego the opportunity of presenting the substitute amendment which I desire to offer. If I could have the assurance that I should have the opportunity to do so, I would not object to the proposition. I should like to have about two hours on the substitute amendment and about half an hour on other amendments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, there will be no difficulty about that. We have two days for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. We have three days.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; we have three days. The Senator from Wisconsin can get the floor at any time and offer and discuss his amendments.

Mr. HUSTING. If that is the understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no limitation on debate until the voting begins.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll be called, Mr. President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I want to understand the ruling of the Chair. Do I understand that, if this unanimous-consent agreement is adopted, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any other business will be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas, the Chair thinks, understands as well as does the Chair, that these formal consent agreements when entered into become, by paragraph 3 of Rule XII, an order of the Senate which can be revoked only "by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed upon one day's notice." So far as any other understandings or arrangements are concerned as to what shall or shall not intervene pending a unanimous consent these are "gentlemen's agreements," which, of course, any Senator can violate if he so chooses. The Chair would be powerless to prevent it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then it involves a gentleman's obligation not to move to proceed to the consideration of any other matter while the agreement is in force?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then the unanimous-consent agreement by its terms means that no Senator shall make a motion to consider other business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that when the Senate of the United States has solemnly said that it will not interfere with a certain procedure it means that no Senator will interfere.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then there is no use of further proceeding with the roll call. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I want to unburden myself this morning. I do not wish to hurt anyone's feelings, but I have some very plain words to utter.

Mr. President, during my 21 years of service here I have learned a good many things about the Senate and its methods of doing business. When it wants to do a thing it can do business as rapidly and with as much celerity as any legislative body in the world; but it can also practice the game of "how not to do it" with more skill than any other body in the world—at least, any I have known of or read about.

I have never known a legislative program of as great magnitude and importance as we have on hand right now. The two subjects of increasing the Navy and Army are both vital; and, while it will take some time for those bills to be prepared, there are bills already on the calendar relating to the subject of preparedness that should be passed, and passed promptly. I am responsible for one of these, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it is my duty to call attention to that bill and try to press it through the Senate as soon as possible. It is the bill to provide for a Government armor plant. It ought to have passed the Senate four or five days ago, but the time has been consumed with discussing the water-power bill, a bill of great importance, I acknowledge; but that bill could have better waited. Unless the Government armor plant is authorized at once great delay will occur and much money will be lost.

I do not see any hope from the progress we are making of our getting through the legislative program before October, if then. Senators who have tried it know how difficult it is to maintain a quorum in Washington during warm weather. Senators who are interested in their reelections are necessarily absent a good part of the time, and no mere politician objects to it. But I think the constituents of a Senator would watch whether he thinks more about his reelection than he does about his public duties and vote accordingly. If I neglected my senatorial duties as much as some Senators I know of, I would never expect to be reelected. I can not see for the life of me how any man with a conscience and patriotism can reconcile such action with his sense of duty. The people sent us here to pass laws and legislate for the whole country, and I always believed faithful and efficient service was the best way to be continued here. That has been the rule by which I have always been guided; and until my health broke down seven years ago I always considered it my sacred duty to be in Washington whenever the Senate was in session, and to be in the Senate itself if it were possible.

I have always observed that courtesy and kindness and willingness to grant favors when it was right to grant them has been the best course to pursue here.

I do not criticize, in ever so slight a degree, the Senator in charge of the water-power bill, but he certainly has allowed that bill to jog along at a snail's pace.

I give notice now that I shall move to take up the armor-plant bill as soon as the water-power bill is out of the way and press it to a vote at the earliest practicable moment. If the Senators who expect to vote for it will help me maintain a quorum, we ought to pass it through the Senate in three or four days at most. All Senators who expect to speak on the bill have had ample time to prepare their speeches, and I shall see to it that the talk is kept up or a vote had.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I observe the Senator from South Carolina gave notice that as soon as the unfinished business of the Senate, which is now pending, is disposed of he will move to take up the armor-plant bill. I desire to say that quite a number of days ago, ahead of any other notice, I gave notice that, upon the completion of the present unfinished business, I would move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Ferris water-power bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate will determine for itself which of those bills is the more important.

Mr. MYERS. Certainly; it is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will supplement that by saying that the Chair will probably decide the matter as to what Senator he will recognize to make a motion. The giving of a notice that a motion will be made carries with it no right of recognition by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hopes the Senator from New Hampshire is not trying to get the Chair into trouble.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I believe there is an amendment I offered which is pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is pending.

Mr. HUSTING. If it is in order, I should like to have the amendment taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is in order. It is now before the Senate. Does the Senator want a vote upon it?

Mr. HUSTING. So far as the pending amendment is concerned, I am ready that it be put to a vote at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I now desire to propose an amendment to the pending bill in regard to taking over power plants in time of national danger. I will read it. It proposes to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States, evidenced by a written order addressed to the holder of any franchise, permit, or lease hereunder, that the safety of the country demands, the United States hereby reserves the right to enter upon and take possession of any power plan developed under a permit, lease, or franchise held under the provisions of this act for the purpose of the manufacture of nitrates, explosives, or for any other purpose concerning the safety of the country and retain possession, management, and control thereof for such length of time as may appear to the President to be necessary to accomplish the said purposes, and then to restore possession and control to the party or parties entitled thereto: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the party or parties entitled thereto such fair and just compensation for the use of said property as may be agreed upon between the said party and parties and the said secretaries: Provided, That it is expressly understood and agreed that such fair and just compensation shall not be in excess of a sum which will keep the party entitled to such compensation harmless of any loss or damage or damages by reason of such taking over, holding, using, and the restoring of the said properties in substantially the same condition as at the time of the taking thereof to the party or parties entitled thereto.

Mr. President, the object of that amendment is to provide as a condition of the lease to be granted that in time of danger, upon order of the President, the Government may take over any water power or water-power development for the purpose of manufacturing nitrates and explosives, or for any other purpose necessary to aid in defense; retain them for such length of time as is necessary, and at the end of the period to turn them back to their owners, or the parties entitled to possession, upon such terms as may be just, but eliminating any war profits.

There is a great deal of concern now in the country and a great deal of talk about taking measures for our defense. At this time we are in a position to say to those who will hereafter receive licenses under this bill that in time of defense we may summarily take over their plants and turn them into instrumentalities in aid of the national defense. It is generally recognized that the water powers have become one of the most useful utilities, if not an absolutely indispensable utility, for the purpose of the manufacture of nitrate and for other purposes connected with the manufacture of explosives, and it would seem that no one should object to this provision going into the bill. It is easy now to put such a condition into a license, to make it a part of the consideration for the license, so that the licensee before receiving the license, the prospective licensee, will agree that in time of war he will turn the plant which he is going to develop over to the Government, so that the Government may take it and use it for the purposes which it deems necessary.

I understand that not long ago there was a mobilization scheme, either adopted or tentatively proposed, for the Government to take over plants, railroads, and other utilities in the country to be used in time of war or danger. This amendment which I have proposed merely puts something into this bill along the line of the policy which we have adopted. I do not see that there can be any valid objection to this provision, and I sincerely hope that it may be adopted and made a part of whatever bill, if any, is going to be passed through the Congress upon this subject.

It is true that it will be agreed that no war profits shall be charged, but that the Government will keep harmless from all loss and damage the proprietor of any plant which it takes over. That is merely to prevent extortionate prices being paid, and it would seem to me that no one would object to that.

I therefore submit the amendment to the Senate, and trust that it may be adopted and made a part of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is entirely useless. During time of war the President has the right to seize any property for necessary military purposes. When war exists the laws are silent. To single out water-power plants and put a provision of this kind in the pending bill would simply embarrass the owners of riparian properties in obtaining capital to develop them. It would simply encumber and confuse the provisions of this bill. Of course, the President of the United States, being authorized to seize any property when a military necessity exists, has the right to seize a power plant; but, of course, to vest in him the power to exercise the right of eminent domain would be a violation of the due-process clause of the Constitution. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, it is true that the Government may have the right to seize railroads or plants of this kind or anything else. It may do so under its general power to do so; but the object of this amendment is not to place it upon any such grounds as that. It is to place it upon contractual grounds—a contract in advance that the Government may take these plants and turn them to the defense of the country. These are a national agency if they get a license from the Government. They are in duty bound under the license, if this condition is put in, to surrender their plants to the United States Government. It is taking nothing away from them at all. It is taking nothing away from them, because they have not got anything yet. They are asking for something, or will ask for something, and in granting their request, in granting their petition for a license, we are merely annexing to that permission a condition which we can turn to our own advantage.

When we hear this talk of armor plants and armor plates, and when we have been told that we are paying for armor plates almost 100 per cent more than these same plates are being sold for to foreign countries, and when we realize that we are in a position where we have got to pay what the manufacturers ask, it does seem to me at this time that it is the part of prudence and real economy for the Government to assure itself in advance that it can get its explosives at the time it needs them at a price that is not extortionate.

Why should we be blind to this opportunity again? Why should not a United States agency, coming here and getting a valuable privilege from the United States, be willing to agree in advance that if the Government that gives it this privilege needs their plants, they will, at least, be kind enough to turn them over during the time that the war lasts, to be used for the public good and for the public safety and for its own safety as well? Why should we not insist upon that instead of saying, "Here, we give you a license to use this great national resource; we are giving it to you for nothing; and when the time comes that the country is in danger, you can use this power that you have got to extort money out of us, to extort money out of the very power that made it possible for you to enjoy the privilege, and to manufacture this ammunition and these other things"?

I should like to ask what we are here for if it is not for the purpose of doing as much good as possible for the Government and for the people of the country? I can not understand that, nor can I understand the weight of an argument that has at its base, whatever may be the purpose and however good may be the faith of the proponent, looking out for somebody that is going to get something from the Government.

They have not gotten anything yet. We are not talking about riparian owners, because under this bill the riparian owners will have to surrender their property to whoever wants to take it, or rather who gets the right to take it, under this law. This is not a riparian-owner bill, because, I venture to say, that 90 per cent of those who receive licenses will have to condemn the dam and power site and take it away from somebody else before they can use it. This law applies to somebody who at some time is going to come here and ask us for something, not for the purpose of improving our navigation, although that may be an incident of the development they propose; but they come here seeking a privilege to turn to account a resource that belongs to the people, if it belongs to anybody. When they come to do that, when they come here and ask for a franchise, can we not say to them, "All right, here is your franchise; but if we get into trouble, if danger comes and we need some powder and some munitions or ammunition to protect ourselves and protect your property we do not want you to hold us up. We want you to let us take your plants for the time being and operate those plants for the purpose of defending ourselves and your property. We are not going to make it possible for you, when we have got to get something back that we gave you for nothing, to hold us up and use the very force that we put in your hands to extort money from the people that made you the present and the gift of this grant."

It does seem to me that this provision ought to go into every license. Then we would not have to assert our rights or prove our rights to take these things before we get them. We would have them right there. It would give us a summary power to take over these plants and to operate them, instead of meeting legal objections or objections of some kind, and especially instead of meeting extortionate prices when we came to settle up with them under this amendment. They would be paid everything that is fair. There would be no loss of profits, no loss of property, no loss of business that would not be compensated for. We merely make it impossible for them to take advantage under stress of war to extort war profits from us.

This amendment is very timely. We are hearing every day the argument, when we want to put ourselves in a state of defense, that it is the makers of ammunition, the makers of battleships, that are back of this preparedness movement; that there is profit in it for them, and therefore they want us to go to war or at least prepare for it. If anything presents a stumbling-block in the way of defense it is this very suspicion that back of this movement are the armor-plate makers of the United States and the manufacturers of powder and ammunition.

We know that. Here we can, at least to the extent of the purchase or the making of ammunition, put ourselves in shape where there is nothing in it for anybody to want us to make war or want us to enter into war. Here again we have the opportunity. We have it in our hands. Nobody charges that it would be unfair to do this. No one charges that it would be inexpedient to do this. There is no argument against it. I have not heard any. No Senator upon this floor has stated reasons why he does not think the amendment should be adopted, or has given any reason for turning down the amendment. There is certainly some good in it; and if there is nothing bad connected with it, why should we not put it in the bill as one of the things at least that we expect these grantees to do in case we get into trouble in consideration of the privileges conferred.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will accept an amendment to come in at the end of line 7 of his proposed substitute, after the words "Secretary of War," as follows:

And in advance of granting the permits or other authorization provided for herein?

Mr. HUSTING. Will the Senator state the amendment again?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I offer an amendment to the amendment, as follows:

After the words "Secretary of War," I move that the following words be inserted:

And in advance of granting the permits or other authorization provided for herein.

Mr. HUSTING. On what page would that come?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. On page 2, at the end of line 7 of the Senator's substitute, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HUSTING. After the word "Secretaries"?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. After the words "Secretary of War."

Mr. HUSTING. I do not see the words "Secretary of War" in line 7.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The Senator has "said Secretaries" in his original amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. Oh, yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. And I understand that the words "said Secretaries" have been changed to "the Secretary of War." I will read the proposed amendment again. I move to add, after "Secretary of War" and before "Provided," the following:

And in advance of granting the permits or other authorization provided for herein.

Mr. HUSTING. I accept that amendment.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to add in behalf of this amendment, which has been accepted by the Senator from Wisconsin, a further argument to the effect that this provision for taking over these plants would provide for an agreement between the Secretary of War and the grantees as to a rate of compensation; and, if the Senator from Tennessee will grant me his attention, far from having any effect calculated to embarrass these grantees, it would be practically an assurance to them as to the stability of their investments.

I understand that there is legislation pending in the other House in connection with this great question of preparedness, authorizing the creation by the Federal Government of power plants for the very purpose that this amendment is supposed to cover. Far from having a tendency to upset these investors, this provision in advance, by way of contract satisfactory to everybody concerned, protecting the Government and the capital that is about to go into the hazard of the business by having a method or rate of compensation agreed upon, would be highly proper and strictly advantageous to the Government and to the parties who propose to build the power plants.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that there are pending in the House and in the Senate some 25 or 30 bills providing for the establishment of munition plants, and if it is not also a fact that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate now have in their general bill a provision for the manufacture of explosives by hydroelectric power?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is that idea to which I referred.

Mr. SHIELDS. And is it not best to let the Military Affairs Committee provide for this, as they have in their hands the policy of preparedness and, of course, are better able to deal with it? Is not that better than to spring it here in a bill relating entirely to manufacturing purposes on the part of individuals?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. In answer to the Senator from Tennessee, I would suggest that this is hardly springing the question of preparedness into or upon this bill. It is simply authorizing the Secretary of War, who is the war minister of this Republic, to make a contract in advance, satisfactory to all parties governing the price at which these plants or factories could be taken over and used for public purposes in time of war, and protecting the public by agreement at a time when the grantee is in a state of mind to accept a fair rate of profit or compensation in advance of the building of his plant.

Mr. HUSTING. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of the Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I understand he has not voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). He has not voted.

Mr. LIPPITT. In that case I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He has not voted; but I understand he would vote upon this question as I do, and I therefore will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JAMES. I was requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are in attendance upon their duties at the Judiciary Committee. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS. I have been requested to state that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness in his family and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—19.

Ashurst	Husting	Myers	Reed
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Sheppard
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Phelan	Sterling

So Mr. HUSTING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 24, strike out all after the word "That," all of line 25, and on page 11 strike out all of lines 1 and 2 down to and including the word "purpose," in the following words:

Whenever all or any part of the power produced at any dam or diversion structure authorized hereunder is offered or disposed of by the grantee to the public, or for a public-utility purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is simply to subject to the regulation of the public-utility commission of the State the charges and rates and services of these grantees, whether they are public-utility corporations or not. It removes the exception and the condition which the bill contains for this regulation, and makes the regulation general and universal under the laws of the State, whatever they may be.

I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not oppose the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Senator to explain the amendment again.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The purpose of the amendment is to subject the service of the grantee to the State regulation without making any qualifications or exceptions. That is all that it does. The bill contains some qualifications and conditions. It says "whenever all or any part of the power produced at any dam or diversion structure authorized hereunder is offered or disposed of by the grantee to the public, or for a public-utility purpose," it shall be subject to State regulation. I do not see any reason for that qualification. Why not subject it to the State regulation in all cases? That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will explain the provision to the Senator. I do not understand that the State has any right or any reason for regulating hydroelectricity or any other public utility manufactured and used entirely for private purposes. It is only over public-utility companies that the States have regulatory authority. This covers every case of a company of any kind that serves the public. I think it eminently proper that it should be expressly provided in the bill that all utility companies shall be subject to State regulation. The Senator proposes to interfere with a provision that was put in for that express purpose; that is, to provide for strict State regulation of the rates of the companies engaged in generating hydroelectricity for sale.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; Mr. President, my amendment would not interfere with that at all. It would leave that in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not believe the Senator intended to do that, but I say that would be the effect of it. It can not apply to a private company that manufacturers for its own use.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How could it be the effect of it when it would leave the bill declaring that the service and rates of the grantee were subject to regulation under the laws of the State? Does not that include public-utility companies? The Senator is entirely mistaken in saying that the State would have no power to regulate any except public-utility companies. It would have power to regulate any company operating not the waters of the State, but the waters which it has been so often said in the debate here, of which the State controls the use. The entire matter is a public matter, and it may be as important in the prevention of excessive charges and poor service and monopoly to regulate the rate and the service when it is furnished to a few manufacturers as though it were furnished to a municipality.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just one moment I will yield.

In answer to what the Senator from Tennessee has said, that the States have no power under certain circumstances to regulate such charges in service, why not leave that to the States and to the State courts and the legislature to determine it? Why should we limit it here? We have not an opportunity in the course of the debate here to inquire properly into the jurisdiction of the States in those matters. It ought to be left to the States to determine.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no limitation or prohibition in the bill. It simply provides expressly for public-utility companies, and that means the company, of course it is needless for me to explain, that manufactures and sells to the public. Whether it is a municipality it sells to or anyone, if it sells for a general purpose it ought to be subject to State regulation. The States have all the power of control over these other companies, and we require all that possibly could be given. In fact you can not give them any powers here.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If they have those powers of control why not allow them freedom to exercise them under the bill? Why limit them as they are now limited in the bill to public-utility corporations? I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that I understand the amendment of my colleague will make the bill read in this way:

That all charges, rates, and service by any grantee hereunder shall be subject to regulation in accordance with the laws of the State within which the service is rendered.

If that is correct——

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is correct.

Mr. JONES. I can not see why there should be any objection to it. I think it was the intention of the bill not to interfere with the regulation by the State in any way, shape, or form; in other words, to leave all the rates and charges entirely to regulation by the State. If we put in the language that all charges, rates, and services are to be regulated by the State it seems to me that that carries out what was the original purpose of the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. It means the same thing. They are subject to the regulation of the State.

Mr. JONES. I am not so sure.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was intended to express it. There can be no doubt about it. Nothing was left to inference.

Mr. JONES. I know that was the intention, but I do not believe it really expresses it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will accept the amendment. I will not debate these immaterial amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not quarrel with the Senator as to whether it is immaterial or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is satisfactory that I should offer at this time the amendment I put over yesterday at his request.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is interested in a similar amendment, is engaged in committee.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Montana is pending. My amendment strikes out section 6, but, of course, it would not be voted on until the amendment of the Senator from Montana is disposed of. I have no objection, I will say, if the Senator wants to dispose of the other amendment first.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think if we could bring all the amendments together it would economize time.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will offer it now.

Mr. SHIELDS. Both the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are out of the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not be offered until this is disposed of. He has a proviso that he wants to offer, and he will offer it——

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection, only I thought we could economize the argument by having them all together, for I think they involve the same principle.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to economize time, too, I will say to the Senator. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of sections 5 and 6 now in the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 5. That the right acquired by the grantee under this act shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the original approval by the Secretary of War, unless sooner revoked or forfeited as herein provided.

SEC. 6. That upon not less than two years' notice prior to the expiration of any grant made hereunder, and at any time after the expiration of such grant, upon one year's notice, the United States, or any person authorized by Congress, shall have the right to take over all of the property of the grantee necessary and useful for the generation, transmission, or distribution of power. Such property shall include the lands or interests in lands acquired or used for the purpose of the development and transmission of power, the dam and other structures, and the equipment necessary and useful for the generation of power, and the transmission system from generation plant to initial points of distribution, and the lock or locks or other aids to navigation, but shall not include any other property whatsoever. Before taking possession the United States or the person authorized by Congress shall pay therefor (first) the actual cost to the grantee of lands or any interests therein purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of power, and (second) the fair value of the other properties taken over, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States in assuming all contracts for electrical energy extending beyond the granting period which have had or may have the approval of the Secretary of War and which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate. The actual cost of lands or interests therein and the fair value of other property shall be determined by agreement between the Secretary of War and the owner of such property, and in the event of their failure to agree, then by proceedings instituted by the United States or by the person authorized by the United States in the district court of the United States within which any portion of such dam may be located.

In determining the fair value of the property other than lands or interests in lands allowance shall be made for deterioration, if any, of the existing structures and transmission lines, and no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted, for good will, going concern, profit in pending contracts for electrical energy, or for other conditions of current or prospective business or for any other intangible element.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment proposed seems to be a substitute for two entire sections of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

Mr. SHIELDS. It has not been submitted to me, and I therefore ask that it lie on the table and be printed. It is impossible for me to consider it without first reading it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have submitted this to the Senator. It has been printed for a week. It was printed on February 17.

Mr. SHIELDS. I asked for a copy of the amendment, and got word that it had not been printed.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the amendment about which I talked with the Senator yesterday. I perhaps did not refer to section 5, but I have included in the amendment sections 5 and 6. The amendment I referred to when I talked to the Senator applied to section 6; that is the really important one. I have no objection, however, to taking that up separately, if the Senator desires to do so; but I include them both in one amendment in order to save time. There is not very much controversy about section 5; section 6 is the one to which I am going to devote what I have to say.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to the Senator from Nebraska explaining it, and I should very much like for him to explain the entire amendment; but I should like some time in which to examine it before a vote is had on it. With that understanding, I am perfectly willing to go on with it.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted and I did not hear what the Senator from Tennessee suggested.

Mr. SHIELDS. I say the portion of the amendment that has not been printed——

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment has all been printed. Section 5 was printed in a separate amendment and section 6 was printed separately; they were printed as two amendments; but in order to save time I introduce them both as one amendment. Now, if the Senator from Tennessee cares to have me do so, I will withdraw that part of the amendment referring to section 5 and let section 6 be pending, and take up section 5 afterwards.

Mr. SHIELDS. Very well; I think we can dispose of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. So far as the amendment applies to section 5, I desire that it shall be considered withdrawn and that the amendment as it applies to section 6 shall be the one considered. I shall offer the amendment relative to section 5 separately. The Senator from Tennessee, however, would be entitled to a separate vote on it, anyway.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not catch what the Senator from Nebraska said.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment which I now propose to consider is to strike out section 6. I am not going to take up very much of the time of the Senate. I have, to some extent, gone over in the discussion which has taken place during the time this bill has been under consideration a great deal of the matter which applies to this amendment, though not all of it.

Mr. President, this amendment, in my judgment, is one of the most important features of the bill; it is one of the fundamental things connected with the water-power-development subject; it is known ordinarily as the "recapture clause." This bill provides for leases which, on their face, run for 50 years. In my judgment, the bill really provides for a lease in perpetuity. For all practical purposes I believe every student of the subject will agree that the bill as drawn and reported by the committee provides for a lease in perpetuity. In its terms, as I have said, the lease will be drawn for 50 years, but to recapture it and to close it at the end of the 50-year period there are so many difficulties to encounter that I do not believe our Government at any time would comply with the conditions with which it would have to comply in order to terminate the lease at the end of 50 years.

Of course no one knows what will be the condition of the country or the condition of the development of electric power in 50 years from now. Everybody concedes that in all human probability there will take place between now and then great changes. Therefore it is difficult to now say what the Government will want to do 50 years hence or whether it would want to take over these great developments and, as a Government, operate them. I believe most people agree that the probabilities are that the Government will not desire to take charge of at least all of the power plants that will be developed under this bill at the end of the 50-year period. If in these leases we make it difficult or hazardous or expensive or unreasonable for the Government to take them over at that time we simply add to the theory that the lease is in fact perpetual.

In the first place, the bill as drawn provides that the Government, and nobody else, may take these leases over under certain conditions. I believe most people agree that what we ought to provide for would be that the Government should have the right, first, to take them over if it wanted to do so, and, second, that it ought to have, either by special or general act, power at that that time to lease them to somebody else. There may be a lease, in the first instance, made to a corporation, and 50 years from now the Government may think it wise and best for the interests of the people to permit some municipality, some county, or some other political subdivision of the State to take over that power, if they so desire. Under the bill as it is drawn there is not any such right contained in it. The Government itself must take it over; it can not designate anyone else to do it. The amendment which I have proposed provides—

That upon not less than two years' notice prior to the expiration of any grant made hereunder—

That would be two years before the expiration of the 50-year period—and any time after the expiration of such grant, upon one year's notice, the United States, or any person authorized by Congress, shall have the right to take over—

And so forth.

So I have provided in the amendment that, if Congress so desires, at the expiration of this 50-year period any of these powers can be taken over by persons designated in the law that Congress shall pass. The amendment says "any person authorized by Congress." In the beginning of the bill the word "person" is defined, so that it would include any corporation, municipality, or anyone that Congress in its wisdom desired should have the right to take over any of these developments.

Mr. President, why should we not now, in trying to look ahead for 50 years, put into the law a provision that should, as nearly as we can, fully protect the Government and the people and the rights of Congress as representing the people that may develop and may exist at that time? It, of course, would not be right to take over a power plant without compensation unless the owners of it had been permitted to charge such rates, during the 50-year period, as would enable them to recoup themselves for the original cost. The bill itself not only limits to the Government the power to take these plants over but it imposes so many hardships and so many difficulties that neither the Government nor anybody else at the end of the 50-year period can afford to take them over.

Section 6, which I am trying to strike out, provides:

And upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted which are necessary and appurtenant or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power—

Under that language what must the Government take over?

All the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted.

There might arise a great dispute as to whether any particular property was dependent for its usefulness on the plant; but this section goes to the limit and says if it is dependent, even in part, for its usefulness upon the water-power plant, the Government must take it over. Suppose a power corporation had built an office building and had their offices in that building. Although it could be used for ordinary commercial purposes in any city, the Government would be compelled to take it over. I do not believe that the Government would want to go into the business to that extent. The property may not necessarily be connected with the development of power or the generation of power or its transmission. Further, the Government must take over those improvements—which are necessary and appurtenant or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water.

Anything that has been acquired that is "valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power," and so forth, must be taken over. Let me read a little further:

And upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States.

The fair value might be——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the language which is now engaging his attention is the language used in the Ferris bill.

Mr. NORRIS. To a large extent, that is true.

Mr. WALSH. I read from section 5 of the Ferris bill as it came from the House:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice, which may be issued at any time after five years immediately prior to the expiration of any lease under this act, the United States shall have the right after the expiration of the lease to take over the properties which are dependent, in whole or in part, for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, and which may have been acquired by any lessee acting under the provisions of this act.

I want to suggest to the Senator that the language used in that bill was very carefully thought out, as he well knows.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; yes; but the Senator will notice, to begin with, that this language does not give the right to the Government of the United States to re-lease the property to anybody else; in other words, it must take it over itself. The United States must go into the business and remain in the business if it wants to take over any of these properties.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he thinks that that is a fair criticism of the bill? It is true that it does not in express terms give the Government the right to transfer the lease to some one else, but if the Government takes it over it would undoubtedly have a right to turn it over to some one else.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Government would have to do it indirectly. I can see how, if the Government could comply with all of the other difficult conditions named in the recapture clause, after it had gotten and paid for the property it might then sell it to somebody else or lease it to somebody else; but there is no such authority given.

Mr. WALSH. It could anticipate it even, and the money could be provided by the person to whom the lease was to be turned over. But that is quite aside from the question which the Senator is now talking about.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is insisting——

Mr. NORRIS. I am talking about the difference between the amendment which I have offered and the bill before the Senate, which is a very different bill from the Ferris bill.

Mr. WALSH. I understand; but the Senator is insisting that the property which is to be taken over is too much; that the language of the bill is too broad; and I am simply inviting his attention to the fact that the language of this bill is exactly the language of the Ferris bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not the exact language all the way through.

Mr. WALSH. Not all the way through section 6, but all the way through so far as the question is concerned as to what property is to be taken over.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not examined the Ferris bill for some time; but, in my judgment, the Ferris bill does not require the taking over of as much property as does the pending bill; but, so far as that is concerned, it is not the section of the Ferris bill which I am offering as an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that distinctly, and I was endeavoring simply to call attention to this one feature of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and no other feature of it, and to point out that the bill under consideration in the features now meeting his criticism is identical with the language of the Ferris bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Some of the language, so far as I have read it, is probably the same. I will take the Senator's word for that; but, as I look at it, while that may be some reason in favor of it—for the Ferris bill was a very carefully drawn and carefully considered bill—at least it is not a final or conclusive reason why the language proposed in the amendment which I have offered is not proper and is not an improvement over the so-called Shields bill, which is the bill I am trying to amend.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I examined the Ferris bill again this morning and compared it with the provisions of this bill in this respect in connection with an examination of amendments offered by the Senator from Montana and by the Senator from Iowa upon a question similar to the one which is here involved. I was struck not only with the similarity of the language which the Senator is now discussing but with the fact that, outside of the charges imposed by the bill for the use of public land, the provisions of it in favor of the grantee, in my opinion, are much more liberal than those of this bill. I believe the Senator is familiar with the Ferris bill. Am I not correct that he is a member of the Public Lands Committee which considered and reported it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Was there any minority report in that case?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there was not any minority report, but that does not mean that the entire committee was favorable to the bill as it was reported.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to say that the Senator from Nebraska is entirely mistaken. There was a minority report.

Mr. NORRIS. I was mistaken. The Senator from California has corrected me. He made a minority report.

Mr. SHIELDS. But the Senator from Nebraska did not join in it?

Mr. WORKS. I was not alone in making the report.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator made it, I understood, but I do not know how many members of the committee signed it with him.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Nebraska agreed with the majority?

Mr. NORRIS. In the main I did, yes; but I was not in favor of all the amendments to which the majority agreed or of the entire bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to an amendment that I am going to offer so that he may consider it in connection with his discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. My attention was directed in reading this bill to the fact that, while it clearly contemplates that the Congress may release the property when taken over by the United States on forfeiture or at the expiration of the term, the rights and liabilities of the second lessee are provided for.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any second lessee in this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. But I think there ought to be some more express provision as to what the United States shall do in case it does not release the property. Therefore I wrote into the copy I am using an amendment which I am going to offer, and with the Senator's permission I will offer it now. It is to add to section 6, after the word "granted," in line 23, page 10, the following:

> When the property is acquired by the United States under the provisions of this bill it may be released for a like term upon like conditions or may be otherwise disposed of or operated by the United States under then existing law.

My recollection is that a provision similar to that is in the Ferris bill. I say "under the provisions of this bill" in the amendment because the United States might acquire it under the provisions of section 8 as well as under the provisions of section 6.

Mr. NORRIS. As I remember it—I think I am reading from the Ferris bill as it passed the House—section 6 in that bill reads as follows:

> That in the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over, maintain, and operate the properties as provided in section 5 hereof, or does not renew the lease to the original lessee upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as may be authorized under the then existing applicable laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the expiration of any lease under this act, to lease the properties of the original lessee to a new lessee upon such terms, under such conditions, and for such periods as applicable laws may then authorize, and upon the further condition that the new lessee shall pay for the properties as provided in section 5 of this act.

That provision of the Ferris bill as it passed the House recognized the fact that at the end of 50 years we can not tell what may be the conditions, what may be desirable, or what may be even possible. Therefore a provision was put in that at the expiration of the time the plant could be leased under laws that would be in existence at that time, assuming, I suppose, that Congress, taking into consideration new and changed conditions that might occur, would pass the necessary laws.

I should like to say to the Senator from Tennessee that while there are some provisions in the Ferris bill that I do not like, at the same time I should be glad to vote for this bill if he will make the necessary changes in it so that it will correspond to the Ferris bill as it passed the House, as far as it is applicable to navigable streams. When Senators cite the Ferris bill as authority the authority is being cited by men who, I presume, will oppose the Ferris bill when it comes up for consideration, if it ever does.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say to the Senator in that connection that there are many provisions in the Ferris bill to which I do not give my assent and for which I do not expect to vote.

Mr. NORRIS. In the recapture clause in this particular amendment that I am attempting to strike out, the United States Government would, in my judgment, and as I construe it, be compelled to pay for the good will of the grantee, whatever that indefinite term may mean. It would be compelled to assume all the contracts that had been entered into. It would be compelled to pay for the prospective profits that might be due in the future. All of that, as I look at it, is absolutely wrong, and I have expressly prohibited it in the amendment I have offered.

I have provided in the amendment as follows——

Mr. SHAFROTH. What line, please?

Mr. NORRIS. I am commencing on line 6 of the printed amendment, page 2:

> Before taking possession the United States or the person authorized by Congress shall pay therefor (1) the actual cost to the grantee of lands or any interests therein purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of power—

The Government or the person authorized by Congress to take it over ought not to pay any more than the actual cost of any lands or interests in lands purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of power. In other words, whatever that land may be worth at the expiration of the 50-year period is not material, and the fair value of it at that time would not be fair for the Government to pay, for the reason that during all the 50-year period that they have operated the plant the grantee has been permitted in addition to other things to make a profit, in the selling of the power that he develops, upon the amount that he originally put into the land. The land has been made valuable, perhaps, and may be worth hundreds of times more than he paid for it; but it has been made valuable because of the right that has been given to him by the Government. In other words, it has a franchise value that has been given to it by the Government, and therefore the Government ought not to be required to pay more than it actually cost.

They shall pay, second—

the fair value of the other properties taken over, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States.

The United States, or the person authorized by Congress, would have to pay the actual cost of the locks that they have put in; and that is fair, Mr. President, although the locks would be worth less money at that time than when the grantee put them in. But the grantee has expended money in building these locks, has been required to do it by the Government, and has been allowed to make a profit upon the money invested in those locks for the benefit of the United States; and I do not provide that they must pay what it would cost to replace them, or their fair value, because in perhaps every case the locks would not be as valuable at the end of 50 years as they would at the beginning, and they were put in not for the benefit of the grantee, but for the use and benefit of the Government. So I have carefully protected, it seems to me, and fairly protected, the rights of the grantee. He would get back the cost of the locks.

And all other capital expenditures required by the United States in assuming all contracts for electrical energy extending beyond the granting period which have had or may have the approval of the Secretary of War, and which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate.

Now, I want to go back to the first item:

The actual cost of lands or interests therein and the fair value of other property shall be determined by agreement—

That is the same as the original bill—

In determining the fair value of the property other than lands or interests in lands allowance shall be made for deterioration, if any, of the existing structures and transmission lines—

That is another provision that ought to be put into every well-regulated recapture clause. Transmission lines and machinery and other similar things, in almost any manufacturing business, become less valuable as they are used and as new inventions are made, so that it may not be worth nearly as much as it cost—

And no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted for good will, going concern, profit in pending contracts for electrical energy, or for other conditions of current or prospective business, or for any other intangible element.

It is provided here that the property that must be taken over shall include—the equipment necessary and useful for the generation of power and the transmission system from generation plant to initial points of distribution.

That is another place where this amendment changes the bill very materially. As I understand the bill as it stands, if the Government of the United States undertook to take over this property, it would have to take over the entire distribution system, no matter how great or how extensive. It might extend over many States and be connected with other dams and even with steam plants, anything connected with it in any way, the Government would have to take over and pay for. My amendment, it will be seen, limits that part of the transmission system that must be taken to the "transmission system from generation plant to initial point of distribution." This is a vastly different thing. The bill in this respect provides for additional things to such an extent that the taking over is absolutely impractical and in effect makes the grant perpetual.

Mr. President, I want to read some expressions from Secretary Lane on the recapture proposition:

It is self-evident, however, that the right should be retained to take over the works upon proper terms and conditions, in order that the same may be taken over and operated by the States or municipalities, and to do this the law and the permit must provide such terms and conditions as will be fair to the permittee, and at the same time not forever preclude the exercise of this right by the State or municipality, because of the impossible amounts required to be paid as a prerequisite to the recapture. It is evident that for the use of the public lands to be granted, no payment should be made to the permittee on that account—

Of course that particular sentence has no application here.

It is further evident that for lands acquired by the permittee during the course of the development payment should be made, but that payment should not include the unearned increment created by the community and not by the power developer. Nor should it include payment for "good will," franchise values, or intangible elements.

It would be interesting, Mr. President, to give the synopsis as he has given it here, I think, of the laws of several foreign countries, the recapture clauses provided by many of them. Some of them take the property over without compensation at the end of the period. Of course, in a case of that kind the rates permitted ought to be sufficient so that they could make that much in addition to the usual fair profit during the period.

I believe that the amendment I have offered is perfectly fair to the grantee and, as far as I am able to see, it fully protects the rights of the Government. It takes no property away from the grantee at the expiration of this period without paying what, under the circumstances, is fair and right. In the case of locks and dams it will cost the Government or the person authorized by the Government to take it over more than they are worth, because they will have to pay the actual cost. In the case of lands, the same rule works the other way. The grantee will get actual cost for the land, but will not be paid for profits, for the value of the land that has been made and increased by the rights which have been granted and the development of the country that has been permitted to take place under the privileges that have been granted by the law.

There ought to be care taken in this kind of a bill so that nothing would have to be paid to take over this lease, either by the Government or by some one named in the law, for any intangible element. Some of these developed powers would become very valuable. Some of them, while of but little value in their raw state, would be worth millions developed, with a business developed and the country developing about them. That is the intangible value; but that value has been made by a privilege given by all the people of the United States, and if they want to take the property they ought not to be required to pay the very value which they themselves have created.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has looked at similar provisions in the laws of France, particularly regarding the taking over by the Government of properties like these, which require governmental sanction, at the end of 50 or 100 years—whether he can state what are the usual terms imposed?

Mr. NORRIS. I have the law here, I think. I am looking for it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I have it here, and I was going to help the Senator out. I have a brief outline of the law here.

Mr. NORRIS. Here it is:

In France power plants on national lands are developed under concessions for periods not exceeding 50 years, at the expiration of which period the grantee, if concession be not renewed, is required to restore the premises to the conditions previously existing or to deliver the plant to the nation without indemnity, as the nation may elect. The amount of rental to be paid is required to be fixed in the articles of concession.

They pay a rental like I thought they ought to put in this bill, but we have failed to do it.

In Norway the law authorizes the granting of concessions for power development for a minimum of 60 years and a maximum of 80 years. When the concession expires the land, with improvements and works, reverts to the Government. Various payments for the privilege are required, among them being the establishment of a poor fund under public control, the surrender of a certain percentage of produced power to the community, also to the General Government, and in certain specified developments there may be assessed a yearly tax of 1.25 crowns for every horsepower over 500.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to read a few more.

Mr. WORKS. Then I will not disturb the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has the Senator completed the reading?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I beg pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. The laws of the Dominion of Canada authorize the issuance of licenses for 21 years, renewable for three further terms of like extent, at a fixed fee, payable annually, and provides that upon the termination of a license the works may be taken over by the Government upon payment of the value of the actual and tangible works and of any lands held in fee in connection therewith.

That is about what I provide for in my amendment here.

Still reading from the Dominion of Canada, it is expressly provided that the value of the rights and privileges granted, or the revenues, profits, or dividends being or likely to be derived therefrom, shall not be taken into consideration.

That is the same idea I have tried to incorporate in the amendment which I have offered and which is now pending.

The Province of Ontario authorizes a lease of water-power privileges for periods not exceeding 20 years, with the right of renewal for two further and successive terms of 10 years each, upon the rentals stated in the lease and upon such other terms and conditions as the minister may prescribe. Upon the termination of the lease the privileges, together with all dams and other structures or works made or erected by the lessee in connection therewith, revert to and become the property of the Crown, subject, however, to the right of the lessee to remove machinery, failing in which removal it shall become the property of the Crown, also subject to payment of compensation to the lessee of such sums as the minister may deem proper for buildings or structures of a permanent character and necessary or useful for the development or utilization of the water privilege.

In New Brunswick the lieutenant governor in council is authorized by law to lease or sell rights and privileges for water-power development upon such terms and conditions as to development and utilization as he may prescribe.

In the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Yukon, and Northwest Territory the governor in council is authorized to make regulations for the diversion, taking, or use of water for power purposes, and for the construction of power-development works on public lands. He is also authorized to fix the fees, charges, rents, royalties, or dues to be paid and the rates to be charged.

In Queensland the law authorizes water-power development under special license, subject to such conditions and provisions as the Governor in Council shall determine for periods of 10 years.

I yield first to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. I think he rose sometime ago.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator that he, in the position he takes, is overlooking the real matter of controversy upon this particular branch of the bill. On account of the dual form of our Government the cases that he cites from other countries have absolutely no application to the situation as it exists. It is perfectly well settled by the authorities, the decisions of the Federal courts and the State courts, without any dissent, that the waters of a stream belong to the State and that the Government of the United States has no ownership in the water and no control over it. The Senator's proposition involves the taking over of that water, in a sense, by measuring the compensation by the value of the use of the water.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WORKS. Just a moment. The Government has no interest in the water, no ownership in it. It is simply the proprietary owner of a piece of land that happens to border on the stream. If that were not so there would be no objection to the position taken by the Senator if he desires to make money out of a proposition of this kind, but it is not a question of policy, of what is advisable to be done, but it is a question of power, of jurisdiction on the part of the National Government to impose any such regulation upon the flow and use of the water.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer the Senator from California first. The amendment immediately before the Senate—I do not know whether the Senator from California was here when it was read—is not the charging of rates, as his question or his comment would seem to indicate. It is the recapture clause.

Of course some of the things I have read were connected with the rate-making proposition, but I want to say to the Senator that I do not claim, and I do not know of anyone who does, that the Government of the United States owns the water in these navigable streams. The Government of the United States has the power to regulate commerce. It can prevent the building of a dam in a stream if it wants to. It can, therefore, as I look at it, allow the building of a dam in a stream on such conditions and under such terms as it may demand, and the person damming it must comply with those conditions or not go into the business. No one is compelled to build a dam. So it is not the ownership of the water that is required here. It is a question of law as to whether we have a right under the Constitution to do this. I have no doubt about it. I know that very able lawyers disagree about it, but I presume if it is not anything but a question of law—and I do not see that it is anything else—if we are doing something that we have no right to do in granting certain privileges here to people to dam these streams, in due time the Supreme Court will check us up and what we do will be of no value. That is true whether my amendment is adopted or not. It is true in regard to this bill in any form, because under all forms and all branches of the bill and any other bill so far as I know pending here in regard to the navigable streams there are certain conditions which are demanded and exacted of the lessee, and if we have no power to exact them, then, of course, we are going beyond our power and our authority. If we have not any control over it I do not know who has.

Now, I want to say just a word about what the Senator said in reference to these citations having no value here, because of our dual form of government. We have a Federal Government and a State government, and those that I read from Norway and the various Provinces of Canada and France have different forms of government. It does not make any difference what you call it, whether it is a National Government or a State, the sovereign power that permits the damming of navigable streams on certain conditions is the controlling factor. In Norway the National Government is the sovereign power, the power that has control of navigation and regulates it. If we as a Federal Government do not exact any condition for the damming of a navigable stream, there is no body on earth who can. No one claims that the States have a right to do it.

So when we are acting as a Federal Government in permitting the building of a dam in a navigable stream and exacting certain conditions for that privilege we are occupying the same condition in reference to that stream as the Province of Ontario is when she grants that permission under certain conditions that she may exact, or the Norwegian Government when it does the same thing, or France when she does it.

So while in this case it is a Federal authority, it is the same authority coming from a Government having the same rights as though it were a State. If the State had control of navigation, if we had no Federal Constitution, or if a different construction had been placed on it and it had been decided that Congress had no authority over the damming and the obstruction of navigable streams and States had, then it is true the right to exact whatever conditions the law-making power might think best would be in the State and not in the Federal Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very important subject. Of course I realize that there are complications in the consideration of it arising from the fact that we have a dual Government, but I imagine that in running streams there is no real property in anyone in the water itself. It is like a bird flying in the air; it is illusive, not reduced to profit.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Of course, the Senator is right in saying that there is no ownership in the use of the water; but there can be ownership in the right to the use of the water.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is it.

Mr. WORKS. That is the important thing at last.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, then, we come to that view of the question. First, we admit that in flowing water there can be no property in the use of that water. There is only one use that the Federal Government has any control over, and that is the use of the water in interstate commerce for purposes of navigation. All other uses, I believe, are under the control of the respective States, but they are all uses. Here the State sovereignty is on the one hand and the national sovereignty on the other, each having control over certain uses of water. If the State sovereignty can attach conditions to that use, if it can attach conditions to the right of appropriating water for any beneficial purpose, why can not the National Government attach a condition for the use of the water over which it has control as a national use? The person who wishes to make use of the water that is clearly under the jurisdiction of the State can not exercise that use, it seems, without the consent of the National Government.

Mr. WORKS. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada if he takes the position that the United States Government has any right to appropriate the waters of a stream?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. WORKS. Its right in the water is limited to the use of it for the purposes of navigation, is it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. For the purposes of navigation; I admit that; but the question is whether, having jurisdiction over that use, and when its jurisdiction is invoked for the purpose of getting a license to put an obstruction in a stream which may affect that use, it has not a right to attach conditions to such a purpose, and just as much right as the State would have in granting a license for uses within its jurisdiction.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I think the definition is quite clear. In the case of the State, it is exercising its sovereignty over the waters of the stream. The Government is simply a proprietary owner of the land. If the land is sought to be taken, its right in the stream is simply for the purpose of navigation, and therefore the National Government would have no more right to take away a part of the sovereignty of the State by inserting a condition in the laws than it would have to do it by any direct act of the National Government. That seems to me to be perfectly clear.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was simply following out the question logically in my own mind whilst on my feet. I really have not given much consideration to this question. It does seem to me rather unfortunate if in legislating upon this subject we can not legislate in such a way as to protect future generations and to enable either the National sovereignty or the State sovereignty to protect those generations.

Mr. WORKS. The right and duty of protection, so far as the use of the stream is concerned, rest in the State. The Senator is simply assuming that the State will do its duty to protect the rights and interest of the public. It seems to me that there is no reason why the Government should step in and undertake to protect the future generations as against the sovereign right of the State to do that thing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, we will assume that the United States Government gives a grantee the right to put up a certain obstruction in a navigable river for the development of water power. Does the Senator mean to be understood that in that case the State can step in and by proper legislation protect the future generations in such a way as that they can utilize this water in some other more effective way in the public interest?

Mr. WORKS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President. The right of the National Government is simply to permit the use of a navigable stream for some other purpose than that of navigation. Whenever the attempt is made to use the water for the development of power or for irrigation or for anything of that sort, then it comes directly under the jurisdiction of the State. The State might prevent the construction of a dam in a stream for any such purpose as that of the development of power, even if under the permit of the Government. Of course the Government can do it for the purpose of improving navigation. It can permit it for the purpose of developing power, for instance, but it can not go further than that. It has no power to vest in any corporation the right to take out or to use any of the waters of the stream for the purpose of developing power. That is simply taking upon the Government the jurisdiction that belongs to the State.

Now, these two things may go together, I will say to the Senator; that is, the Government may give the necessary permission to use a navigable stream for a purpose that is within the jurisdiction of the State. But, after all, when it comes to the construction of a dam and the effort to take out and use the water the right comes within the jurisdiction of the State, and the State may impose any condition that it sees proper.

Not only that, but if the water should be appropriated and used for the purpose of developing power, the State authorities would have the right to say that it should be used for another purpose, namely, for irrigation, or for domestic use, because of the greater importance to the public of that use. In other words, the power to deal with the question of the use of the water is absolutely under the power and control of the State, and it is a sovereign power. It can not be taken away by the Government by way of contract or in any other way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is great force in the Senators' argument, I must confess; but I would ask him, then, assuming that we have to deal with two sovereignties in order to protect future generations and give them perhaps what they are entitled to, what action would the Senator have? Would he have cooperative action between the Government and the States or would he have each one acting in a detached way on the subject?

Mr. WORKS. There must be cooperation in order to accomplish the result that is attempted by this bill. I will say to the Senator the first step or one of the necessary steps in the proceeding is to procure the consent of the Government that a navigable stream shall be used for that purpose; and whenever that right is given by the Government, then the functions of the State must come into operation. If the Government should grant this permit, unless the party procuring the permit complies with the State laws he could not use the water of the stream for the development of power or for any other use.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is there anything, I will ask the Senator, in this bill which requires the grantee to show that he has complied with the State laws?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; one of the objections I made to the bill the other day was that it was impossible that the permittee could comply with both laws, because with the bill as it is now proposed to be enacted the State laws of California, I know, would be in direct conflict. I do not believe there could be a single project taken up and carried through under this law in my State. So I am not so very much interested in the question as to whether the bill passes. I do not believe there will ever be a single dam constructed for the purpose intended by the bill in my State under its provisions and the conditions that it contains.

Now, I have proposed an amendment here, which I expect to offer after awhile, simply providing that the Secretary of War may grant a permit to any municipal or private utility corporation to construct a dam in a navigable stream, imposing such conditions as will protect and preserve navigation; that if any public land be necessary the Secretary of the Interior may dispose of that land to the permittee if they can agree upon the price; if they can not, then giving the permittee the right to resort to condemnation proceedings in order to acquire the title as in other cases.

Now, what objection can there be to that simple way of doing it, if the object of this legislation is to promote the development of power? When the Secretary of War has done that thing he has done everything that is within his jurisdiction, and it seems to be an idle thing to undertake to cover this legislation up by all sorts of conditions that will prevent the development of power instead of appropriating it.

I have wondered a good many times who was the original ingenious patriot who conceived the idea of the National Government taking over to itself these properties at any time or under any circumstances. I am unable to understand or appreciate what possible reason there can be why the Government, by virtue of this present legislation, should be authorized 50 years hence to take over the property that has been acquired and developed by the permittee. Of course, Senators have different ideas about that matter, but I have never been able to understand why and for what reason that should be done.

If the Senator has any reason in his own mind for thinking that it is advisable to legislate now for a condition which may exist 50 years hence, with respect to the taking over of this property, I will be glad to have his views upon that subject, because I know he has broadly considered this question. Perhaps no other Member of the Senate has given greater attention to the question of the improvement of our rivers and harbors and various other improvements of that kind than the Senator from Nevada and I have great respect for his convictions and knowledge on the subject. But it does seem to me that in this proposed legislation we are attempting to go not only beyond the jurisdiction of the Government, but we are undertaking to legislate for future generations and that it may very well be left for legislation when the necessity for it arises.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have not been able to attend this debate, having been very busy upon other matters, and I am perhaps entering upon a field which has already been covered. I am seeking information more than I am endeavoring to express fixed views.

I think there is great force in what the Senator from California says, that the jurisdiction of the National Government over these waters is a limited jurisdiction, and yet it has practically been declared to be a paramount jurisdiction; that is to say, the States can not exercise their sovereignty over certain uses of water in such a way as will interfere in any way with the control of the United States Government over navigation, and that makes the National Government practically an overlord in this whole business.

I simply want to protect the future, and I am groping my way along with a view to ascertaining some method by which it can be done now without leaving these questions to be adjusted in the future or without leaving the whole subject matter to so drift as to practically put it out of the control of either sovereignty 50 or 100 years hence. That is one reason why I object to this bill. I object to any piecemeal legislation upon this subject.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that the whole trouble about this matter is that we are trying to settle the question by Federal legislation, the important thing of which must be settled by State legislation. We can not settle it for the States. We have no power to protect the interests of the citizens of the different States respecting a matter over which the State alone has jurisdiction. The vice of this bill, which goes to every part of it, is the fact that we are attempting to legislate about a matter over which Congress has no jurisdiction.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but we can, it seems to me, provide the machinery by which the cooperation of the sovereigns can be secured, and that is what this bill lacks.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; we can do this much, Mr. President, and that is all we can do—remove any obstacle that would prevent the putting in of these dams for the purpose of developing power. In other words, we can give the consent of the National Government that the streams shall be used for that purpose, and when we have done that we have done everything the National Government can legitimately do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But we know that the States have not always exercised their functions in the protection of the people, and that is one reason why the national power is sought to be exercised.

Mr. WORKS. That may be the trouble.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It does seem to me that by providing a fit system of cooperation between State sovereignties on the one hand and the national sovereignty on the other we can secure some method of action upon the part of both that will result in the proper protection of the future, and that is what I want to see accomplished. For that reason this bill is unsatisfactory to me. Any piecemeal legislation on this subject is unsatisfactory.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator is entirely right about that, and I sympathize with his desire to bring about the development of all these natural resources. I think we should be interested in doing that very thing. Certainly the Senator does not maintain that the National Government can take jurisdiction over the affairs of a State because the State is not doing its duty toward its citizens or exercising the functions that belong to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not think it can, but I do think that when the National Government is called upon to exercise its jurisdiction with reference to an issue that is clearly within its jurisdiction it can exercise it in such a way as to bring about cooperation with the States in the public interest, and thus avoid acting individually, throwing the whole subject matter of legislation into the distant future, when probably it would be utterly impossible to catch hold of the subject as it can be taken hold of now in the interest of the public.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator why at any future time—I care not when—the utility commissions of the States could not come in and regulate rates and thus prevent imposition by corporations?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but how about the uses of water for purposes that are not in the character of public utilities?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, there are none that are not of that character.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I imagine that the use of water power for the production of nitrates, for instance, would not be a public utility, would it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think it would. Why would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The rates on the power would be subject to regulation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but suppose a corporation is organized simply for the purpose of making nitrates through water power; it is not furnishing power to others; it is using it itself. How does the public-utility service of the various States operate in such a case?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The waters of the stream are absolutely under the control of the State, and the State can impose such conditions as it pleases, whether the water is sought to be appropriated for one purpose or for another. If it is a matter about the rates to be charged, it can be fixed; of course, the State has the authority to do that. If the water is sought to be appropriated for some purpose, the use of which can not be measured in that way, the State has the undoubted right to determine upon what conditions it shall be used for that or for any other purpose. It is completely within the control of the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the National Government has not that power.

Mr. WORKS. It is completely within the control of the States, and the National Government has no such power.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to be led into any legal or constitutional argument upon this question. I object to legislation that takes up this water question in sections and deals with it in that way. The water question, it seems to me, is a unit, and it ought to be considered in a very large way. We talk about property in water. We might as well talk about property in birds in the air or in wild animals in a state of nature. Water is elusive; it is making an eternal circuit; drunk up from our gulfs and oceans, it floats in the form of clouds through the remote interiors and is precipitated. It is the great agency of plant growth; it enters into every physical organization both of man and of beast, and is capable of uses that are very valuable to mankind. When master it forms one of the most destructive agencies of which we know. It seems to me that we ought to deal with the water question in a comprehensive way. And how are we dealing with it?

We passed an irrigation act that takes care of one phase of it; we have passed an act for the acquisition of various lands in the Appalachian Mountains and the White Mountains, and we have taken that phase of it; but in no adequate way. Whilst the power under which we acquired those lands was the power of interstate commerce and the promotion of navigation, nothing has ever been done to make those lands at all useful in navigation.

We are going on acquiring lands year after year in the most purposeless way, and we have got proposals to take hold of the drainage question—the question of our swamp lands; and we have two bills relating to water power, one relating to water power on navigable streams and the other relating to water power in the streams mainly nonnavigable, but which are the sources of navigable streams where the public owns land. Then we have got the use of water for navigation, and we are dealing with that in a separate way through the employment of the Corps of Engineers in the United States Army in channel digging and levee protection. Then, whilst admitting that all this water is under two jurisdictions—the National jurisdiction with reference to a certain use and the State jurisdiction with reference to all other uses—it is never sought to bring the sovereignties that have control over water in its entirety into such cooperation as to make legislation and administration effective.

I am told that this bill will be followed in a few days by the so-called Ferris bill, which relates to those streams where the public lands are. Why should that be considered separately from this bill? Why should the drainage of swamp lands be considered separately from this bill? Why should irrigation be considered separately? Why should we not consider in one bill all these uses with reference to which the national jurisdiction is invoked? Then why should we not in that very process bring the State into cooperation with such machinery as we shall organize, so that every use will be promoted in the interest of the public good?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I think I could suggest to the Senator from Nevada a reason why the Ferris bill and the one now before the Senate can not very well or very consistently be combined. This bill has at least a foundation of some jurisdiction on the part of the National Government to deal with the subject, because it grows out of the navigable character of the streams over which the Government has control; but the Ferris bill undertakes to deal with lands, as the Senator has suggested, that do not border on navigable streams, and the right to deal with that question is founded solely upon the ownership of the Government of the land itself. That, however, gives the National Government no jurisdiction over the use of the water; it has no interest in it at all of any kind. It is simply the proprietary owner of a piece of land that borders on a stream, and that is all. It has no more right to deal with the question as to how that water shall be used than would the private owner of land upon the stream—not the slightest. Therefore it has no real basis or foundation upon which to rest. It is a pure assumption, or attempted assumption, of power that does not exist in the Government. It is a usurpation, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and nothing short of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And yet the National Government must be solicitous to dispose of those lands in such a way as to advance the public good; and inasmuch as the jurisdiction of the waters is a divided one, it seems to me that there is the same need for cooperation there as there is in this case. I speak of cooperation in such a case as insuring legislation upon the part of both sovereignties that will be in the public interest, and I assume that a national board, brought into cooperation with a State board, would be able to devise some scheme of legislation and of administration that would advance the public interests.

I have no disposition at all to burden the permittees under this or under any other measure. I do not believe it is a wise thing to attempt to exact tolls from the permittees for the privileges granted in this act or in any other act that relates to water. I do not think the Government should seek to make money in any way, because just to the extent that they impose burdens upon the permittees just to that extent the burdens imposed upon the ultimate consumers will be increased. Our effort should be to make the whole construction as cheap as possible, the operating expense as cheap as possible, with a view to making the rates as low as possible.

I wish some method could be devised by which these various bills which are now pending could be put into the hands of some subcommittee, chosen from the various committees that have jurisdiction of these various sections of the water question, which would present to Congress a full and comprehensive measure that would cover every use of water, the coordination of these various services, and cooperation with the States.

It seems to me we are dealing very unwisely with the whole subject. We are so averse to taking hold of this question in the large, which is the only way of taking hold of it, we are so dismayed by the big figures which adequate river development presents, that we are taking hold of each individual phase of the water question in the hope of saving money, and at the same time we are absolutely necessitating a larger expenditure in the future in order to cover the ground that can be now covered. We are also possibly endangering the entire scheme of full development of these rivers for every useful purpose and for the prevention of every destructive use.

I have an amendment here proposing to add to this bill the provisions of the river-regulation bill, which I have been urging for years. I imagine, however, that it would hardly be wise to press it, simply because I know there is a difference of opinion as to the extent to which we should go in that bill. Many are dismayed by the very large figures presented—$60,000,000 a year for 10 years—and many of my friends, who believe in the legislation, urge me to abandon these appropriations and the creation of this large fund and to content myself simply with an entering wedge by the creation of an organization that can gradually work out the system; but I think that the success of the whole movement depends upon a candid admission of its largeness and a calm facing of a large expenditure. I do not want to sneak into a great enterprise by any concealment as to the possible expenditure during the next 10 years. It seems to me to be the wiser way to accustom the American people and the Congress of the United States to the fact that this is a great, big problem that is going to involve an enormous expenditure—an expenditure which, in my judgment, will never end.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have always been very strongly attracted to the general plan suggested by the Senator from Nevada, but I have always thought—and I think I have mentioned it to him on more than one occasion—that the plan must begin with an amendment to the Constitution.

I put to the Senator from Nevada this condition: In the State in which I live the beds of the navigable streams are owned by the State. Therefore one who desires to build a dam for the purpose of developing power, or for any other purpose, must go first to the State and secure the right to plant the dam upon the bed of the stream. Second, he must consult another interest, which is local in its character, namely, the riparian proprietor, who has a right in the flow of the stream. I rather agree with the Senator from Nevada that it is exceedingly vague to say that the State owns the water of a stream. It may be technically true, but in those States in which the common law prevails on that subject the riparian proprietor has an interest not only in the land which borders upon the stream, but he has a right in the stream itself and to the natural and ordinary flow of its waters. So that a person who desires to build a dam must first secure the consent of the State, because the dam is to be built on land that is owned by the State. He must next secure in some way the right to build the dam against the riparian owner if the riparian owner is affected by the structure. Then he must go to the General Government, and there the whole difficulty begins.

As an original proposition, I have always doubted the right of the General Government to say to an applicant who desires to build a dam in a navigable stream "You must not only not obstruct the stream for navigation, but you must so build your dam that it will improve navigation." I question that authority on the part of the General Government, and have always challenged it; but, no matter whether that doubt is well founded or not, the applicant must deal with these entities, and I have never been able to conceive of any way in which they could be gathered together and dealt with simultaneously or in concert. There is no way under our Constitution by which that can be accomplished, and if the Senator has a definite notion with regard to the way in which that can be done I would be very glad to hear him, even at the expense of the time that would be involved; but if there is no way under our Constitution, then the desirable purpose which the Senator from Nevada has in view can not be accomplished, no matter how many commissions may be created, no matter what functions of the various governments he may invoke. Is not that the real difficulty with the effective plan which the Senator from Nevada proposes?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Nevada, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa, with relation to his statement that the proprietor of the land has a riparian right to the flow of the water, is not that true to the extent only where the State does not designate otherwise? I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. CUMMINS. I said, Mr. President—and of course the Senator from Colorado did not hear me—that my proposition was true where the common law with regard to the rights of riparian owners prevailed. I understand perfectly that it does not prevail in Colorado or in California. It has all been changed in those States and in other arid or semiarid regions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the attention of the Senator to a case in Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States, page 54, and will just read a clause from the syllabus:

> The flow of the stream of a navigable river is in no sense private property, and there is no room for judicial review at the instance of a private owner of the banks of the stream of a determination by Congress that such flow is needed for the improvement of navigation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the Senator from Colorado will admit that the power of the General Government in securing navigation is paramount to the rights either of the State or of the riparian owner. That is perfectly well established.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will not the Senator also concede that the power of the State government with relation to the use of that water is paramount to the right of the riparian owner?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that. Whenever the State sees fit to designate how the water shall be used, it is within its sovereign power, of course, and many States have designated how the water shall be used and who shall be entitled to its use; but I was putting to the Senator from Nevada a case founded upon the laws of my own State, which has not declared how the water shall be used or who shall use it, but permits the common law with regard to the rights of riparian owners to continue.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will be glad to answer the query of the Senator from Iowa, but first I should like to ask him a question. He says that it would be impossible adequately to deal with the subject without a constitutional amendment. Now, what constitutional amendment does he have in view? An amendment that will put the whole control of the rivers in the hands of the National Government or the whole control of them in the hands of the States?

Mr. CUMMINS. Either the former or an amendment that will authorize the States and the General Government to act in concert in some fashion or other.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, if that is the conception which the Senator from Iowa has of this question, he is undoubtedly right in his position that we must first amend the Constitution. It is utterly impossible, under the Constitution as it is now, to vest either in the States or in the National Government the whole control of this question, because one has jurisdiction under the Constitution of one branch of it and the other of another branch of it, and both of them must be consulted before anything can be accomplished in the way of developing power or putting in a dam for any such purpose as that. So that until we amend the Constitution it is utterly impossible to vest this power either in the States or in the General Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I agree as to that, that without a constitutional amendment it would be impossible to vest the entire control of the rivers either in the National Government or in the States; but I do contend that these sovereigns can make businesslike arrangements with each other regarding any individual project. An entire river may be regarded as an individual project, and if the National Government can make a businesslike arrangement with all the States through which that river passes it could accomplish in that way, by negotiation and contract, the beneficial purpose that would be otherwise accomplished by a constitutional amendment, which would vest the absolute and full control of the river either in the one sovereign or in the other.

Furthermore, we have not got a constitutional amendment which disposes of the matter in the way the Senator from Iowa suggests, and there is no likelihood that we will have one. We must meet present exigencies of extreme urgency, and it seems to me that the sensible and businesslike thing is to immediately provide the machinery by which the minds of the various sovereigns can meet, so as to enable them to exercise their powers in such a way that they will dovetail with each other and contribute to the same general purpose, instead of resulting in confusion and contradiction as between the sovereigns.

That is the main purpose of the bill which I have been urging. It contemplates the creation of a national commission with certain powers, among others the power, under certain conditions, of adjusting costs and benefits, we will say, in a particular project with the various States. It contemplates ultimately the creation of similar commissions by each one of the States, with powers either general or limited, possibly requiring State ratification, the ratification of the legislature, and so forth, yet the machinery being afforded for accomplishing the purpose of the full development of the river for every purpose.

I am not going to enlarge upon that bill now. I will state that the President is now, upon the urgent application of citizens of the State of Louisiana, making a careful study of the subject with the view of making some recommendation to Congress. I regard it as very unfortunate that we can not, by some system of teamwork among the committees having jurisdiction of this subject, bring into one bill every possible use that the States or the Nation can make of water and bring into exercise every jurisdiction that can in any way attach to water, or, at all events, furnish the machinery for so doing, and provide an ample fund not only for investigation, but for actual work. I think this sentiment will grow in the Senate; I am sure it is growing. I think, as we go along with these various bills, we are realizing all the time that it is important for us to deal broadly and comprehensively with the whole subject, and I think that we are, by this piecemeal legislation, letting the subject slip away from us, so that it will be very difficult for us to deal with it adequately in the future.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the bill which is being considered. The proposition of the Senator is to give certain powers to the National Government as to the termination of the permit which is granted; but to my mind the amendment throws an obstruction around the bill, so that in all likelihood no company would ever undertake the construction of dams as is intended to be done by this bill.

The Senator no doubt recognizes the fact that whenever navigation works are to be constructed they are going to cost a great deal of money. It will be necessary to find some one who is willing to put up that money, some one who will put up, not $100,000, but perhaps millions of dollars, and for the ostensible purpose, the primary purpose, of aiding navigation. That is not to cost the National Government one penny. It is a gift on the part of this company. Now, these companies will not do that unless they get a return for it; and whenever you put obstructions in the way and impair their rights they are going to say: "No; we will not undertake this enterprise at all"; and thus stagnation will take place, just as it has existed in the United States.

I believe that the National Government, not having any jurisdiction over water except for purposes of navigation, ought to impose just as few restrictions as possible, because it is a State function to take care of the rates that may be charged; and this very bill recognizes that in another section of the bill, which gives to the State full power to regulate rates. If you hamper the construction by too many "ifs" and "ands" you are not going to get any power there to be regulated by the States.

For that reason it seems to me that all of these motions that are made, apparently—and in good faith, too—for the protection of future generations and for the protection of the people, intended, no doubt, for that purpose, will work a defeat of the very object of the bill. Inasmuch as that might occur, and in my judgment very likely will occur, why can we not leave these things just where the law places them, namely, in the States and in the public-utility commissions of the States?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is power given anywhere to the State to levy a charge for the privilege of erecting the dam?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; it can do so. It can make a charge. It has full jurisdiction as to the use of the water, and it can prescribe under what terms it can be used.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to answer the question asked by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. The constitution of Texas, I think, is very much like that of Tennessee. In fact, I understood that the original constitution which Gen. Houston had adopted in that State was an exact copy.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The State of Texas owes much to Tennessee, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. But the provision to which I am going to refer is common to all constitutions. The general assemblies of the States are authorized to create privileges, and they can declare almost any business a privilege, and can tax it. The States can declare the business of these water companies a privilege, and can tax them according to the size of the town they are in, or according to the business they do, or in almost any form they may please. Wherever these water-power developments have been made they do tax the privilege, the franchise, and the companies pay a State tax, and every dollar that is put on them here in the way of a charge is taking that much revenue out of the treasuries of the States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The State has the undoubted right to impose such conditions as it sees proper to impose respecting the use of the water; but the policy of the State, I think uniformly, is not to impose any additional burden on the use of the water, because the State is regarded as a trustee for the people in handling the water. The water really belongs to the people. It is for their use. We are adding one more burden to the consumer whenever we impose any condition that involves the payment of any additional amount. Whatever the power of the State may be in that respect, it is never exercised, so far as I know; certainly not in the State of California.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think it has ever been exercised in the State of Colorado, either; and, as the Senator has said, the object is to impose as few burdens as possible, so that under the law which gives the public-utility commission jurisdiction of rates the company can not dodge the fact that they are chargeable with reducing rates by saying that they have other burdens imposed upon them. Experience has shown that whenever a tax of any kind is imposed upon a corporation which is required to furnish any public service, by the time the consumer gets to pay the rate charged for the service he is bound to pay it back, and it is multiplied three or four times; and thereby the State, acting as trustee for its people, would be in effect not acting in the highest interest of the people by imposing these preliminary burdens upon them.

I have an illustration of that in the franchises that are granted by the cities. They make contracts with corporations. A corporation says: "We want to get a street franchise here," and the city immediately says: "Well, what is going to be your rate?" "I will charge so much per passenger"; or, if it is an electric-light company—this being a case involving electric power, perhaps I had better illustrate it in that way—"I want to put up an electric-light plant and use the streets of your city." The city often asks: "Well, what will you give for this thing?" They say: "We will give $100,000." That seems like a great big amount of money, and the city probably needs that amount of money for some particular purpose, and it seizes upon it and says: "Yes; we will take that, provided you furnish the electricity at, say, 10 cents per kilowatt-hour," or "6 cents per kilowatt-hour." Then, Mr. President, there comes an improvement, an invention within a few years afterwards, and by reason of that invention the cost of electricity is reduced a third, or more than a third.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In just a few minutes.

Take the use of the tungsten burner. The tungsten burner has decreased the price of electricity, or the amount of power used in lighting incandescent lamps, to one-third what it was. In other words, upon a certain given power that formerly was used the tungsten burner now creates three times the illumination that would be created by the old burner, and consequently the price ought to be reduced. But no company will go in and get a franchise from a city and pay for it upon any such basis, not knowing whether such improvements will be made or not.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. The result is that they make a contract; they get the $100,000, and then, when the public-utility commission comes around and says, "Here, why are you charging this amount?" the answer is, "Why, we have a contract with the public authorities, which contract is to the effect that for this $100,000 our rates for 20 years shall be so much," and you can not get jurisdiction over them to regulate them. Yet, at the same time, the decrease in the cost of the very thing for which the city has made the contract has been such that if there had been no contract made and if there had been no $100,000 paid there would be a saving to the people, through the action of the utility commissions, of millions of dollars often. It is not wise policy nor economical policy to accept $100,000 for something which deprives you of the right of regulation, which might and often would save the people millions of dollars.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I wanted to interrupt the Senator before he got away from the question of taxation. Do I understand, from what the Senator has said, that the State of Colorado taxes the public-utility corporation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not for its franchise, because the city grants it.

Mr. HUSTING. No; I mean on its property.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. HUSTING. And there are State taxes and municipal taxes?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; and county taxes.

Mr. HUSTING. And the Senator thinks that the man who travels on the railway pays that tax?

Mr. SHAFROTH. To a certain extent, of course.

Mr. HUSTING. I understood the Senator to say to every extent—that he pays it all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, I have no doubt that if you impose a burden on any enterprise—I care not what it is—ultimately the consumer has to pay it, and not only has to pay it but has to pay it three or four times over; because when the company has to pay this tax it has a speculative feature in it, and the result is that it wants a profit, and it is not going to take the ordinary profit of 10 or 20 per cent, but it is going to double the price or perhaps treble the price, and thereby the people will not get the benefit of the transaction.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to ask the Senator, then, what is the use of taxing them? Why not put the entire tax on the laborer and cut out all other taxes and make it a direct tax and save the expense of collection of taxes, which is very high? Why not impose the tax directly on the last man and make him pay it and exempt everybody else from taxation—public utilities, railroads, and everybody except the ultimate consumer?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I should think the Senator from Wisconsin might distinguish between the cases he has suggested and a case like this, where by imposing a burden of this kind a tax is imposed upon a few consumers. The tax is not uniform, extending over the State. I may say that one of the strongest reasons why the representatives of the Western States are objecting to the imposition of this additional burden is that it is in direct opposition to the policy of the State itself. The State will not impose this additional burden, and very naturally, as the trustee of the people who have the right to use the water, it objects to the National Government imposing that burden and increasing the rates to the consumers.

Mr. HUSTING. Now, I should like to have the Senator from Colorado answer my question, if he will.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that, of course, you have got to have money with which to run a government. There is no doubt about that. On that account you have got to levy taxes, and you have got to collect them, and it has got to cost something to collect them. But, as a matter of fact, whenever you impose a burden upon an enterprise you will find that the enterprise is going to get out of what it pays for the privilege or what it pays for the right to do the business. You will find that it is going to get out two for one, or three for one, on the consumer himself.

Mr. HUSTING. Then the method that the Senator suggests finally doubles or trebles the tax on the consumer. Why go about the matter in this roundabout way, especially if you want the revenue quickly? Why not levy the tax directly on the consumer and make him pay it immediately, and cut out all the expenses of an intermediate collection of taxes and filtering it through all these various bodies, if the Senator's theory is correct?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hardly see the application of the Senator's statement to the conditions that are sought to be imposed here. In the first place, here is an attempt to make a charge for a privilege over which the Federal Government has no control whatever. I have not heard a single Senator claim that the Federal Government has any control over water power, no matter where it is located. Consequently, it has no right to make a charge unless it usurps the right of the State, and when it does that it does a wrong to the State. Now, the States are able to take care of these matters, and they will do it much better than this Congress will. I will tell you that. They will impose the proper burden at the proper place, but they are not going to cripple an enterprise of this kind when, as a matter of fact, it would not undertake it at all with such a charge. If it does, then it is a legitimate charge, and the State has a right to do it. But when the National Government, admitting that it has not any right whatever to a drop of water that flows in a navigable stream or in an unnavigable stream, either, says, "We want this much money out of it," it is equivalent to saying, "We will not permit the development unless you do something," which is a usurpation of the rights of the State.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator for what reason and purpose, then, do these people come to the Congress of the United States? Why do they come and ask this privilege if we have no authority or right in the premises?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, in this instance, for example, you can not obstruct a navigable stream, you can not put a dam in it, without the consent of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Unquestionably. Then that consent is valuable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is what they seek, and that is why they come. If that be true, pray why should we not make a charge in the interest of the whole people? These companies are not entering into this enterprise for the love of humanity. They are doing it for the profits that may come and for the value of the franchise that they may hold for 50 years, and mayhap for all time.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that while it may be a benefit to the party who acquires the right to construct the dam, it is in no sense a detriment to the Government.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Unquestionably, it may not be.

Mr. WORKS. Therefore the Government can not, in justice, require that there shall be paid, as a condition of the grant, an amount that comes back eventually to the consumer.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That may be true with reference to every franchise and every privilege that is given.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The grant of eminent domain comes back ultimately, you may say, to the consumer. It is a gift of the Nation. When the great railroads were built across the continent——

Mr. WORKS. No, Mr. President. If the effort is made to take property by condemnation proceedings, that is taking something that is of value to the Government, and for which it should be paid.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I can not be made to believe that. I feel that we would not be doing justice to ourselves nor to the constituents we represent in this body if we granted away—or, I should say, frittered away—these enormously valuable privileges and rights to private corporations without a recompense. As I said the other day, I would rather wait. You say that unless we do this the power will not be developed for 50 years. Then we had better wait a hundred years, and develop it then, rather than have these rights frittered away and put into the hands of greedy private monopolies. I believe that is the vice of the pending measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There would be something in the argument which the Senator makes if there were not a regulating commission, but the State has a regulating commission.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. True; to regulate public utilities.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Suppose a man starts a shoe factory. That would be, in a way, a public utility. Suppose he starts a gristmill, if you choose. Could your regulating commission reach that?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from New Jersey, like a good many other people, assumes that we are granting to somebody a franchise to use the waters of the stream, which is not true in any sense. We are not granting any franchise. We are simply giving a privilege to construct a dam in a stream that does the Government no harm or detriment. We are granting no franchise whatever.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. True. A perpetual privilege and a perpetual franchise, however, are one and the same thing. They are the same thing with different names.

I do not want to believe that the men who are prompting these measures are here for selfish purposes. I know that they are not. I know to the contrary. But I also know that there is a great organized force in this country that is standing ready and greedy for every opportunity to acquire the public domain and every opportunity to acquire great privileges in water power or other privileges that may come; and I feel that it is not our part to defend them, but rather first to defend the people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the Senator makes a wrong inference if he thinks that any man in this body——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I did not say that. I said distinctly to the contrary. I said I do not believe that any gentleman here has any such motive; but there is a great organized force and a great body in this country that is attempting at this and every other opportunity to enrich itself at public expense.

Mr. SHAFROTH. On the question of there being an organized body, a person could just as well say that it is to the interest of the people who have patented coal lands, for instance, or who already have their water sites located and operated, not to permit any competing ones, because their price might be cut down by reason of it. That is not the proposition at all. The proposition here is, What is the best thing for the people?

Now, here is an illustration. I should like to know whether anybody believes that railroad building would ever have been as extensively carried on in the United States as it has been if a charge had been made upon the part of the National Government? We know that on the public lands, for instance, here comes a railroad. What has it got to do? It files its line of definite location. That is all. What does it do then? It is required to begin construction within a certain time and then it gets its right of way. There is no obstruction whatever. The result is that it builds its line, and these different railroads compete with each other; and while there may be combinations, there are public-utility bodies that are taking into consideration the amount which they have invested as capital and permitting them to earn no more than a fair dividend upon it.

But suppose, as in the case of city franchises, a pittance is paid to the city and thereby the jurisdiction of the public-utility body is cut off. The result is that you fritter away for a small sum the rights of the people to such an extent that they have to pay two, three, and probably four times the amount that is paid into the city treasury for the privilege.

That, however, is a matter of State affair. Can you not let the people who ought to have the payment of these matters determine the question? Is it possible that the Congress of the United States over here should say, "We know best what is to the interest of Colorado, and therefore we will not leave it to you, but we will fix it according to our notion"? We have tried that, Mr. President, with relation to the public lands and the water-power sites out there, and the result is that we have had hardly any development at all, as was shown by the Senator from Montana, where the development took place previously to the withdrawal order of 1909.

Is it possible that you should do that injury to the people? Is it possible that they can not have the privilege of attending to this matter as they please? I can assure you that they will take a good deal better care of their own people and save a good deal more the exactions upon the people than will the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska simply increases these burdens. It increases them in the event that the United States wants to take over the plant and transfer it to somebody else. There would be another objection to it on the ground that these companies will undoubtedly have to bond their plants, and in bonding a plant it may be that at the end of 40 years or 30 years they will want to issue more bonds upon it or renew their bonds, and the result is that it will hamper the concern and will make the company hesitate as to whether or not they will ever make the improvement.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator refers to bonding their plant. I have not a doubt that they will bond it and stock it and restock it, and the public will have to pay the interest on it. That is the history of every one of these great corporations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say that the United States is at fault if that is being done. I must say that we ought to have passed a law providing that before a corporation can do anything in interstate commerce it should be permitted to organize only upon the appraised value at which the property is put in and to the extent of that appraised value, and no more, it can issue stock and issue bonds. I am heartily in favor of that and always have been. I always have insisted upon that being done in State affairs. You will control the matter in that way. I do not see why we hesitated after we started to do that. It simply shows that we are not as keen about these matters as are the people themselves in the States, and for that reason it seems to me that that legislation ought to be enacted by this Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the bill provided, in the section now under discussion, that when the United States takes the property at the end of 50 years, or whenever the permission expires, it shall pay double the value of the property, and some one should move to reduce that to the value of the property. Would the Senator vote for or against that motion?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, well, after the contract has been entered into with the Government of course it ought to be complied with, whatever it is; but I must say that that goes to the very question of whether or not the company is going to go into the development. There is the feature. If too many restrictions are placed around it, the company will say "Well, we do not want to improve these navigable streams for the Government. We do not want to take out a million or two million dollars of our money and give it to the Government, and rely upon getting an income from power which may or may not turn out to be profitable."

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that in order to induce the investment of capital it is necessary for the Government to agree to pay a great deal more than the value of the property when the lease expires?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I do not know that it is at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the very point involved in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it is not. There are a great many distinctions.

Mr. CUMMINS. He says, and I think, that it requires on the part of the Government a payment of much more than the value of the property.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President; the situation is this: It is one of those conditions which the party, in undertaking the enterprise, studies to determine whether or not he is going to lose money on his investment. That is what is bound to come to his mind. The result is that all of these obstructions in that line have a tendency to make him say: "No; I will not undertake it."

You now have upon the statute books a law for the improvement of navigable streams, but why have you not been able to do anything under it? It is because of the restrictions that have been thrown around it. We want these powers developed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what are those restrictions in the present act that prevent its operation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. One restriction is that in fixing the charge you can take into consideration any reservoirs that may have been constructed; you can take into consideration a forestry system which the Government has established. All of that can be taken into consideration in determining what should be the charge. Those are very serious objections, it seems to me.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator know that any man has made an application for a permit and has refused to take it because the charge was too high?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not know. I think any person who would read the act would say: "Why, I can not comply with that and therefore I will not make any application."

Mr. WALSH. Now let me ask the Senator this question: Is not the present act unworkable because before you can do anything at all with it you have got to come here and get a special act passed?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is one of the reasons; but still they can do it; and then, at the end of 50 years, if it is a proposition that pays at all, you are going to have a question as to whether or not the permit can be revoked and whether you will not be having competing people here for the purpose of trying to oust the person who has the plant; and that is something that he takes into consideration at the start. It is an obstruction in the way of getting him to put in his money to improve these sites and to improve navigation; and whenever you make such a requirement you obstruct it.

They used to tell me to make permits revocable. They said, "Oh, yes; let them be revocable, because the Government never will revoke the permit of any enterprise that is doing fairly well and trying to obey the law." But we found that there was one man who two days before he went out of office revoked 40 permits upon which millions of dollars had been spent by people, one of the plants furnishing electricity to the city of Denver for light and power; and yet, without any reason—no violation of any rule, no violation of anything, but just because it was said that they wanted to force a leasing system upon the Government—those permits were revoked.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it has been suggested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] that there might be a watering of the stock and an overissue of bonds and various other things. In the State of California we are strictly guarded against anything of that sort. The railroad commission of California has a right to determine just what amount of stock shall be issued and what amount of bonds shall be issued, and the water commission has the absolute control of the use of the water and the charges that shall be made for it.

There could be devised no better system, in my judgment, than we have in the State of California, and we are dealing with a matter over which we have jurisdiction. The Senator would have the National Government interfere and attempt to control a matter over which it has no jurisdiction, and in a much more imperfect way, I am afraid.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, nine-tenths of these water-power plants will be constructed upon land that is not owned by the Government, nor does the Government own within probably 100 miles of them. It does not own the land. It does not own the water in those instances. It gets the companies to put up a million or two million dollars for the purpose of making the river navigable, and yet it wants to impose burdens and hardships and a franchise tax, as it were, as has been asserted by some, for the purpose of getting something for this which it does not own.

Mr. President, I do not think it is fair. If there is any benefit to come from this thing, it ought to go to the States. It is the States that own the water. They have a right to control it. The proprietor of the land is entitled to nothing more than it is worth. The Government is simply the owner of the water in a proprietary sense and not by right of exercising any jurisdiction whatever over it.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be defeated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have heard it said that under this bill one concern or one combination might obtain control of all the remaining water powers in the country. I wish to know from the Senator from Colorado whether he thinks that can be done.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see how it can be done. They can not obtain any control without the consent of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHEPPARD. True. But is there anything in the bill that will prevent one combination from making application after application to the Secretary of War, complying with all requirements, and finally obtaining control of all the remaining plants?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think not. I can not conceive how it could be done.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is there anything to prevent it in this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Except that each contract is on a distinct and separate dam. That is what is provided. There is not any provision here for the grantee getting a number of dams. There has to be a separate contract in each case.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But might not the same company make separate contracts for the different plants?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should not think so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am asking the question for information. In applications for coal lands one entryman is restricted to a certain amount or a certain territory.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but after he gets the land, of course he has a right to convey it. He has a right to alienate it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But I understand that he can not get any more after he has a certain amount.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that may be.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is there any such provision as that in this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think that there is any provision one way or the other. There is supposed to be a separate contract, and the Secretary of War is there to guard it. If he thinks there is anything of that kind, he can refuse to grant it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is nothing here that requires him to refuse to give the same concern, the same combination, the control of any number of water powers?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not conceive of any such condition ever arising. It is the first suggestion of the kind that has been made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has it not been shown in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, after a careful investigation, that one concern now owns practically all the water powers, or nearly all the water powers, now in operation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In electric plants generally there has been a combination, and that ought to be stopped. There is no doubt about that in my mind. I think that there ought to be a regulating force to compel them, and we have a regulating force in the State of Colorado. I read yesterday from the report of the commission on utilities where in one instance they saved some $300,000 to the people by reducing the rates that were charged.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But under this bill the State has no right to issue a permit to use the stream. That right must be first given by the Federal Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, the permit of the Federal Government is in favor of letting them construct a dam so that it will not obstruct the stream, but the consent of the State must be obtained also. These dams can not be constructed by the Federal Government unless the State consents to it. It used to be entirely with the States. There never was a law upon it until recent years. For a hundred years past the National Government did not even interfere, assuming that in the interests of the people the States would prevent an obstruction to navigation. Now there have been some acts of Congress passed, and they have to come to Congress in order to get a bridge bill. It is the consent of Congress that must be obtained in order that the plans presented by people will not obstruct navigation. That is right, there is no doubt about it, because navigation is one of the high uses of the stream.

Mr. JONES. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Texas that section 12, it seems to me, covers the question he asked about as fully as we can cover it by a provision in the law. This is in addition to the discretion which exists in the Secretary of War. He grants permits one at a time. Has the Senator read section 12?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have read section 12, but I do not see that it prevents one concern from being granted successive permits. Will the Senator read the section? He has it there.

Mr. JONES. I have it here. I thought the Senator understood what it is. It is as follows:

SEC. 12. That the works constructed and maintained under authority of this act shall not be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, controlled, or operated by any device or in any manner so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or monopoly, or form the subject of any unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or Territories, or within any one State or Territory, in the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I will say that that section is almost word for word from a section in the Alaska coal act which was prepared by Secretary Garfield in order to prevent combinations in Alaska.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That section, however, does not prevent one legitimate concern from obtaining all the powers available.

Mr. JONES. I suppose not, if it buys them outright and becomes the owner of them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the point I want to make. There is no specific provision in the bill prohibiting one combination or one concern from obtaining and controlling all the remaining available water powers covered by this bill.

Mr. JONES. Of course theoretically that is probably true, but as the Senator from Colorado said, practically that would be impossible. I do not see how we could go to the point the Senator from Texas suggests.

Mr. WORKS. Let me ask the Senator from Washington if he regards monopoly in applying water power by proper regulation to be an injury to the public?

Mr. JONES. I do not. I think inevitably it is very beneficial, and results in better service than any other way.

Mr. WORKS. I think all this cry about monopoly as applied to the use of water is of very little force.

Mr. JONES. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I think experience has shown beyond any doubt that it is better that there should be monopoly. We have this experience in California. We have two telephone companies operating lines all over the State. The result is that we are paying the expenses of keeping up two of those plants where one would serve every purpose. Being properly regulated a monopoly is not harmful in the least.

Mr. JONES. That is the position of the leading advocates of so-called conservation, Mr. Pinchot and Mr. Fisher, as was shown the other day by quotations read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, in regard to the question put by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], I will say that, of course, one company could secure eventually all the water-power developments licensed under this act. If it can not do it by a direct application for a license, it can do it by way of assignments from the original licensees. There is nothing here regulating the right of assignment in any way. Of course, these things may drift into the hands of one combination in a particular section and throughout the United States eventually. In that case, of course, the transmission of electricity could get into the hands of one institution.

Not only that, but this bill is very favorable to that end. It looks to me as though it makes it as easy as it possibly can be made by law. I do not think there is anything in the bill that any water-power concern attempting to get its hands upon the water power could possibly object to. There are no safeguards around the assignments. There is nothing to hinder these combinations. In fact, as was stated frankly by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], these combinations are desirable. Not only that, but this recapture clause in the bill provides, as I said a little while ago, that if the United States at the end of a 50-year period should want to take over one of these developments it would have to take over all of the transmission lines that are in any way connected together. It can not take a part. It can not take one unit here and one unit there. It must recapture the whole of it, and if it does not recapture the whole it can recapture no part of the whole. In other words, under the condition in the recapture clause the license will continue after the 50-year period, and hence the license is in effect a perpetual or an indeterminate one that may never terminate until or unless the United States decide to take over all the transmission business in the United States.

I say to all intents and purposes this is a perpetual franchise, subject, of course, to be terminated by impossible conditions, conditions that will never be accepted by the United States Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the Senator this question? If a citizen desires to obtain so much Government land for agricultural purposes, he is limited to a certain amount?

Mr. HUSTING. So I understand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If he desires to make an entry on coal land, he is limited in the amount that may be assigned to him?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But in the assignment of water power—that is, the right to operate the water power, which is a Government possession, as much a part of the Government's domain and possession as coal or land on the public domain—there is no limit as to what one individual or one company may acquire?

Mr. HUSTING. I think the Senator from Texas has stated the proposition correctly. It is entirely true that the policy sought to be adopted here, or at least suggested, is different from that suggested in regard to any other public utility.

The Senator from Colorado referred to the building of railroads and the land grants, and he made the statement that we would not have had the development we have had if we had not done what we did do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I did not refer to land grants. I thought the land grants were outrageous. The land grants by the Government in the aid of the construction of those roads made a donation of 155,000,000 acres of land, equal in area to all New England, Pennsylvania, New York, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, and it was outrageous to do so. But that just simply shows that Congress is not as safe as would be the people of the States interested.

Mr. HUSTING. I understood the Senator to say if we had not adopted the policy we did there would not have been any railroad construction.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I said in relation to regulating the right of way, 100 feet wide, where there is a definite line of location, the utility commission come in and say you must charge a reasonable rate. They reduced the rates last year $700,000. The railroads have been compelled to reduce their rates in the State of Colorado. So you can see the power given the utility commission, and you can see that the people are safe because they elect that commission.

Mr. HUSTING. I agree with the Senator in what he says about the outrageous land grants, but at the same time there must have been a potent argument advanced to carry that grant to those railroad companies. That is something that I think we must all agree was out of all proportion to the end sought to be accomplished.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will permit me, he says there must have been something. I remember those land grants. It was not this Congress, but it was the Congress of the days of the crédit mobilier—of the policy of addition, division, and silence. Mum was the word in those days, and it went through.

Mr. HUSTING. Whatever it was, the Government disposed of the domain described by the Senator from Colorado. I say it would seem that if we had taken that domain and put it upon the market under proper terms and conditions we could have gotten enough money out of it to build these railroads ourselves. I go further than that and say that if we would have leased our coal lands, and imposed a royalty of a fraction of 1 per cent upon the product, and if we would have taken our oil lands and disposed of them in the same way, making people pay into the Treasury of the Government a small percentage of royalty, much less than they have to pay now to the owners of the fee, they would have been treated much better by the Government; that is, if the Government had remained the proprietor. The initial grantee did not get anything out of it probably, but, at any rate, the present owners who get the royalties from the operators get royalties far in excess of what the Government would have demanded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Following the Senator's line of argument, would it not be equally applicable to agricultural lands that have passed out of the hands of the Government?

Mr. HUSTING. Not at all. I think that is a far different proposition. There the development of those resources was dependent upon the individual, the man on the place, who, through his work, through his attention to business, developed his farm and made it contribute something to the general betterment, whereas coal land and oil land and things of that kind were granted away to the individual without any reference to the development of the same for coal or oil purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not want to continue the controversy, but the Senator is certainly mistaken. The development of coal land and oil land and the precious metals has been brought about by as much hardship and as much individual labor as the development of agricultural land.

Mr. HUSTING. That is very true in the last analysis, but not by the initial grantee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. By the original discoverer. He is the one who does the work.

Mr. HUSTING. By the original discoverer that is true, but to whom did he pay the royalty? He paid his royalty or the equivalent of it to the man who happened to own it and who got it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Government owned it and never got any royalty from it.

Mr. HUSTING. I can not follow that argument, for this reason: Those lands were sold without any reference to their mineral value because they were sold to anyone who wanted a homestead, and subsequently oil and minerals were found on the place. Some one went and made a bargain with the owner who, perhaps, knew of the mineral wealth on his place, and who never concerned himself with that until some one else discovered it. He is the man who got the profit out of it. He now gets the royalty instead of the royalty going into the Treasury of the United States. That is the only difference.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in metalliferous mining surely the Senator recognizes the fact that the prospector and those to whom he sells are the individuals who get the money afterwards. Somebody may buy it and pay a large price for it and make money, but the prospector is the man who had it by right of discovery.

Mr. HUSTING. I am not referring to gold mining or placer mining or anything of that kind.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Surely the Senator thinks gold mines and silver mines and lead mines ought to pay a royalty if coal or phosphate or something of that kind ought to pay it?

Mr. HUSTING. No; I do not think so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now let me suggest——

Mr. HUSTING. Because I do not class them with the commodities I am talking about. I am talking about something everybody must have, something that is easily discoverable, like coal or oil and perhaps our heavily timbered lands that were visible, of course, and that were disposed of without any reference to their value as timber.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to suggest to the Senator this thought, and that is the reason why I am opposed to the Government leasing system: It is because of the fact that under the laws existing between the States and the United States you can not tax the land as long as it remains in the Government of the United States. That means that you can pick out large bodies of land in any State and absolutely exempt them from taxation forever. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that taxes upon land for 30 years with a reasonable interest on each yearly payment equals the value of the land in my part of the country, and I think it equals it in the Senator's, and thereby it imposes a burden on the State which makes it, in fact, pay for this land every 30 years, and yet it never gets a title to it.

Mr. HUSTING. That is the point I was going to make when interrupted, that if we had gone into the leasing system and charged only a small fraction of what the people are now obliged to pay to somebody else who got these great rights without paying anything for them, you could have built the Panama Canal, you could have built your highways, you could well have afforded to pay the taxes of several States. You could have granted to the States these mineral rights and have let the operators pay these royalties into the State treasury, and you would have had the tax problem solved.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that in the United States we have the cheapest coal in the world?

Mr. HUSTING. That is aside from the question. We have the cheapest coal because we have it lying around us everywhere.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Other countries have the leasing system, and coal there sells for nearly double what it does in the United States.

Mr. HUSTING. Of course, we have so much that there is no comparison between the supply here and the supply there.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The United States, according to tables that have been given in a Senate document, the number of which I forget, show that the United States in the year 1911 consumed or dug out of the mines 405,757,101 tons of coal, and that the average price of that coal, not including anthracite, was $1.11 a ton.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not to the consumer, however.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; because he does not get it from the mouth of the mine.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have investigated it exactly. It is $1.07 to the owners of these great monopolies and $7 and $9 a ton in my town to-day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the coal companies he is talking about sell it to the consumer or to any person who wants to take it at the mouth of the mine at $1.11 a ton.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator, I beg to say, is not literally correct. The coal miners or the coal corporations regulate the price that coal shall sell at along the line of the New Jersey Central and the Reading Railroad, and they declare that coal shall not be sold at certain times of the year for less than $7 a ton or $9 a ton, and I have seen it sell for $12 a ton.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say to the Senator that I will join him in any legislation that will prevent any such combination, because it is in restraint of trade; but you can not blame the coal operators when they are willing to sell at $1.11 a ton at the mouth of the mine for what the consumer has to pay, because only $1.11 a ton is the price of his product.

Mr. HUSTING. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me finish just this thought and I will close. In Illinois it is $1.11 a ton at the mouth of the mine; in Indiana it is $1.08 a ton; in Pennsylvania it is $1.01. That is not anthracite, but the ordinary bituminous coal. In Ohio it is $1.03 and in West Virginia it is 90 cents, and we have at Norfolk, Va., the cheapest coaling place in the world for ships. Hundreds and thousands come there for that very purpose. It can not be said, Mr. President, that these figures show that there is a combination among the coal owners. The combination may be somewhere else.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will pardon me, when he referred to the coal mines he happened to mention West Virginia. I had some little experience down there last year, as some Senators will remember. When I think of the bitter controversy that ensued there and the slaughter of humanity as though they were dogs there is nothing much to state in favor of private ownership and no Government control of that great commodity.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We are talking about prices. I am not talking about other connections.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator was talking about the price at 90 cents a ton. With coal at 90 cents a ton they rob the poor miner in a thousand ways, more than 30 per cent more.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be true, but I was talking about the price that the mine owner got at the mouth of the mine.

Mr. HUSTING. The only reason why I objected to the interruption is that I know there is a desire to limit debate, and I do not like to have this taxed up against me as my part of the time. If Senators are willing to let the debate go on indefinitely I do not care.

Regardless of the price of coal, whether it is cheaper here than it is over in Germany or somewhere else that is not the point; the point I make is that in order to get the privilege to mine their coal that they now enjoy they had to pay somebody more royalty than they ever would have had to pay the United States, and coal is higher now than it otherwise would have been. Suppose, at the time the United States was disposing of the coal lands, the Government had required the payment not only of a royalty but had reserved the right to regulate the price of coal, and to regulate the price of oil; we would not have any such thing as monopoly here now, and the price of oil and coal to-day would be subject to governmental control. Not having done this we are helpless in that respect, and as a consequence we must pay the price fixed by those who sell us the coal. In short, those who got our coal and oil at their price now sell it to us at their price, and the people got the worst end of both, going and coming. With the water power it will be the same way if this bill goes through. Senators speak of a tax or royalty put upon a public utility as a tax that somebody else has to pay. It seems as though when taxes are placed upon the backs of any but those of the laboring man they run off like water off a duck's back. It seems as though taxes would not stick to anybody unless it sticks to a man who labors in the streets and can not shove it onto anyone else. As I suggested at little while ago, if that is the correct theory of taxation, what is the use of taxing public utilities, what is the use of taxing railroads, what is the use of taxing anything or anybody who can escape the taxes, as the Senator from Colorado says they do. To tax the railroad companies or public-service corporations or utilities, the Senator says, is merely to take the money out of one pocket and put it in the other, or putting it in one pocket and taking it out of the other.

If that is the correct theory—and I have heard lots of economists and Senators claim that it is—we will save lots of time and lots of money by levying a direct tax on the laborer, on the man who works on a salary, on the man who can not shove it on anybody else. Find out who the ultimate consumer is and put on him a direct tax and make him pay for running the whole Government. If that is true, that is the way it ought to be done. If it is not true—and I do not think it is true—the thing to do is to tax a corporation or a public utility or a railroad company. They will at least pay something of that tax, and however little it may be, still it would go into the Treasury and help pay the running expenses and reduce the taxes that otherwise must be paid by some one else.

The complaint has been made since time immemorial that the tax burden has not been equitably apportioned and that it always has rested most heavily and unjustly on the man of moderate means, and consequently that those who were best able to pay were escaping the payment of their just share of the Government's expense. Our party has always taken the position that these complaints were well founded and that if intrusted with power we would do all in our power to equalize the tax burden. And yet when we now have the opportunity to provide a means to carry out our pledge and when we now propose to have privileged individuals and corporations pay a portion of the tax in return for immensely valuable resources put within their control for their own profit we meet the argument of "What is the use? The people will have to pay it anyway." Are we to concede that we are impotent to do anything to relieve the already overburdened individual from any part of his tax burden? I can not follow that kind of logic or that manner of carrying out our party pledges. I propose that we do the best we can; that we at least show our good will and that we try to make our last great national resource crystallize in the people's interest and not for the profit of the few individuals and corporations.

But I rose to speak on the legal phase of this proposition this afternoon. Some Senators say that the United States jurisdiction over navigable waters is a jurisdiction that is repugnant to State rights, or something to that effect. I do not think there is any question that the United States, under the commerce clause, has jurisdiction to regulate the building of dams and the right to impose conditions for the improvement of navigation and development of water power. As I understand it, the right to control navigation is a constitutional right. I am only speaking upon this subject because of the fact that when this matter reaches a point where as a matter of policy it seems to be right there is raised the question of the jurisdiction of the United States over our navigable waters, and whenever you demonstrate that we have jurisdiction and the right to legislate on the subject, then they question the policy of doing it. We ought at least to settle one thing at a time. Before going into the question of the proper policy of the Government in regard to the development of navigable rivers it seems to me we ought to settle the legal question. Then, if that be admitted or demonstrated, we should proceed to settle the policy involved.

Has the United States a right to do what this bill proposes to do or what the other bills propose to do? As I understand it, the right of the Government is a constitutional right. If that is a constitutional right, then it is not something reserved to the State but something that is granted by the State to the United States. If the United States has that right, then it has the other rights necessary to carry out the constitutional purpose with which it is invested by the State. There is no lack of authority to show that the United States has jurisdiction over the navigation or the navigability of our waters, and anything that affects that must necessarily be subject to that constitutional right of the United States to protect and preserve its constitutional right.

I have here a speech of ex-Senator Root on the question of the Connecticut River dam bill. I have not the number here. I quote some of the things that Mr. Root has said on the question of the jurisdiction of the United States over our navigable waters. I understand that he is considered an authority on these questions:

> The whole system, the great system of slack-water navigation, upon which we are spending money by the millions, is in the exercise of that function of the National Government to make navigation, not merely to preserve it, not merely to protect it, but it is to promote it, to extend it, to create it, and if, in the judgment of this Government, the diversion of the water from any stream is likely to interfere with the Government's making it navigable, it is the right of the Government to prevent that diversion.

Again, at another place he said:

> It is well settled, of course, we all recognize, that the United States has plenary power to enter upon a system of river improvement, and if there be obstructions require them to be removed, or, if they are not removed, to remove them itself in order that it may discharge its function. It is well settled that a State has the right and the authority paramount over the rights of riparian proprietors to improve the navigation of the streams within the State for purposes of intrastate commerce, and that the United States has still paramount authority whenever that navigation forms a part, as it ordinarily does, of the avenues of interstate or foreign commerce to supersede the action of the State and itself to improve and to create navigation; and it is for the protection of that right and duty of the United States that it is made necessary to obtain the consent of the United States whenever anyone wishes to do work which will obstruct navigation.

There is a great deal more, which I have underscored here, which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator from New York is equally mistaken in that respect. My question was whether the Government of the United States had the right to prevent a riparian owner upon a stream from diverting water for beneficial uses so long as that diversion did not in any way interfere with the navigable quality of the stream?
> Mr. ROOT. * * * The consent in ordinary cases under the general law of an officer designated by Congress—ordinarily the Secretary of War—is required to excavations and constructions in navigable waters of the United States under the provisions of the river and harbor act of 1909, I think, which have been carried along since that time.
> As to the building of dams, the consent of Congress has to be obtained, and we have passed carefully framed statutes to regulate the form in which the authority shall be granted and in which it shall be exercised.
> Now, let me undertake to state some very simple propositions regarding the exercise of this power of the United States in regard to protecting the field of future navigation and the field of present navigation. The consent of Congress must be obtained for the building of a dam, whether that dam affects present navigation or prospective navigation.
> The first proposition that I make—and it seems almost too simple to take up time in stating—is that Congress has the power to give or to withhold its consent to persons or corporations seeking to build a dam in a navigable river or a river that can be made navigable, whether that dam will or will not create water power.
> Second. The power to give or to withhold the consent of the United States to the building of such a dam results from the right and duty of the Government to preserve and improve navigation under the commerce clause of the Constitution.
> Third. The power to give or withhold consent to the building of a dam is absolute and uncontrolled, except by the discretion and judgment of Congress. No power on earth can compel Congress to give its consent or compel Congress to withhold its consent. That power is vested by the people of the United States in their Congress. No court can mandamus it; no court can enjoin it; no Executive can control it. The judgment of Congress alone must determine whether the consent be given or be withheld.
> Fourth. The just exercise of the power to give or to withhold must be determined by reference to the object to attain which the power has been granted, and that is the object of preserving or improving navigation.
> Fifth. Congress may impose conditions upon the consent which it gives in the exercise of its power to give or withhold. This right to impose conditions is inherent in the power. The right to give or to withhold carries necessarily the right to say, "We give, provided such and such things are done; otherwise we withhold," and that power to impose conditions is illustrated by the statutes which are ordinarily spoken of as the general dam laws.
> Mr. ROOT. I will now make my apologies to the Senator from Idaho on the assumption that I shall find that he is right and I am wrong regarding the question that he asked.
> I think I was about to state the sixth proposition in the series which I was undertaking to state; that is, that the just limitation upon the conditions to be imposed upon the exercise of the power to grant or withhold consent to the construction of a dam in a stream that is navigable or to be made navigable is to be found in the interest to subserve which the power has been granted to Congress—that is to say, the interest of navigation—and that there is no other limitation upon the just exercise of that power. Congress can not be compelled to grant its consent or to withhold its consent. It may impose conditions upon the granting of its consent, and a refusal to accept the conditions is a refusal of consent. The conditions to which it imposes should justly be adapted to promote the interests for which the power to consent was conferred upon Congress—that is to say, the interests of navigation.
> The seventh proposition is that Congress alone can determine whether a given condition does or does not subserve those interests. Congress alone can determine the question, because Congress alone has the power to grant or to withhold the consent.
> These propositions are so elementary, so simple, that I do not apprehend any controversy about them. But, sir, they lead inevitably to the conclusion that when Congress imposes as a condition of granting consent to the construction of this dam the requirement not only that a lock shall be provided for the passage of vessels but that a part of the proceeds of the water power developed shall be applied to the improvement of navigation of the stream Congress is acting within its power and is performing the duties that the Constitution imposes upon it to preserve and promote the interests of navigation.
> * * * * * * * *
> Let me read a few sentences from the statement of the Senator from Minnesota:
>
> "For the purpose of promoting and regulating foreign and interstate commerce Congress is given plenary power over all the navigable waters of the United States to the end of improving and maintaining their navigability; and this power is not limited to the navigable sections of streams, but extends to the tributaries and feeders of the same, for without the control of these the power over the navigable sections might become wholly impotent. (United States v. Rio Grande Co., 174 U. S., 690.) Neither can any limits be placed upon the methods of improving the navigability of streams nor upon the means by which commerce can be carried on upon the same.
> "Science has in recent years evoked from the great storehouse of nature the hidden and well-nigh limitless power of electricity and utilized the same in various ways for the promotion of commerce, industry, and the domestic and social well-being of mankind. The bounds of such power and use can not well be defined or foretold. That such power has become and may still much further become one of the great instrumentalities of commerce is evident. While sail, aside from the oar, was the only known motive power on water, the limits of navigation was confined to tidewater. The discovery of steam extended navigation on our streams far beyond the limits of tidewater, and who can tell how much further hydroelectrical power generated by a dam in a stream may extend navigation on that or some other stream? The water in a stream may not only be used to float and carry a vessel, a boat, or a barge, but it may also be used to furnish the motive power for the navigation of the same. And a dam erected in a stream carrying interstate commerce can well be utilized for this double purpose; and Congress, having jurisdiction over the improvement and regulation of an interstate navigable stream, has ample power to resort to all reasonable means for the improvement of navigation and the promotion of commerce on such a stream. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)
> "If for the purpose of improving the navigability of a stream carrying interstate commerce the Federal Government constructs and maintains a dam, with locks and gates, the Government has the undoubted right to establish and maintain, in connection with such dam, an electric-power plant for the purpose of furnishing motive power to operate such locks and gates. And the Federal Government has the right to sell, lease, or rent, for compensation, any surplus power that may arise from and be an incident to such an improvement of navigation." (Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co., 142 U. S., 254.)
> Both the rights of the riparian proprietor and the rights of the State are based upon the old maxim that water runs and ought to run as it has been accustomed to run. The riparian proprietor is entitled to whatever benefit may come from the flowage of the water past his door. Whether the riparian proprietor owns the bed of the stream or the State owns the bed of the stream makes no practical difference, for if the riparian proprietor owns it he owns it subject to the public right of passage and in general of fishery and the public right to have the water flow on for the benefit of all below on the stream.
> Mr. President, that does not apply in the States which have established the right of prior appropriation. The so-called arid or semiarid States have adopted, by the necessity of the conditions existing there, a different system, and any discussion of the rights of the Government and of the propriety of legislation in those States would necessarily have to proceed upon different lines and from different starting points than a discussion of legislation relating to water rights in one of the old States which proceed according to the common law.
> If the riparian proprietor owns the bed of the stream, he owns it subject to the common right. If the State owns the bed of the stream, the State owns it as trustee for the public, for the preservation of those same common rights, and subject to the rights of the riparian proprietor. There is and can be no conflict between the two, and the question of title to the bed of the stream is quite immaterial.

> The question, I think, we ought to ask ourselves is, How shall we decide as between three possible courses of conduct? One is to do as we have, in general, done in the past, refrain from improving because it costs too much, costs more than the business to be developed would justify; or, second, shall we go on and improve these streams and tax the entire people of the country for the improvement? Or, third, shall we avail ourselves of this new discovery by which a stream can be made to improve itself, by which a stream can be made to pay the expense of fitting itself for navigation, so that this great work of internal improvement may go on? Which of the three shall we do?

* * * * * * *

Of course every candid mind familiar with the history of the growth and development of our country must realize that in the extravagance of our vast natural wealth the Government has given away franchises and property with a lavish hand, and that probably the time has come when it would be wise and reasonable for Congress, as trustee for the people, to exercise somewhat more care in conferring upon individuals or particular corporations large blocks of our natural wealth. The lavishness with which our natural wealth has been portioned out has applied equally to the States. Some States have been cautious, but some States have been very incautious and reckless in the way in which they have granted franchises and property rights to corporations. I think there is a general feeling throughout the country among the people of the States that there ought to be greater restraint exercised in that respect by the State governments.

* * * * * * *

The first thing that was done, and, in the nature of things, the first thing that could be done toward accomplishing this object was to put a stop—and we put a stop here in Congress and in our National Government—to the process as it applied to handing out valuable things that belonged to the people of the United States. In the nature of things, also, the complete stoppage of the process presently led to inconvenience, and people began to complain. We had a joint committee here, on which I sat for months, listening to testimony in which the two ideas were exhibited. I refer to the Ballinger committee. It was quite plain that there were two ideas, each one an idea that nobody need be ashamed of, but coming in conflict, because neither had adjusted itself to the other—the idea of stopping the wasteful and extravagant parcelling out to individuals of the property of the whole public and the policy of utilizing our wealth for the benefit of the people of the country, and that can not be done without leaving somebody to make a profit by the utilization of that wealth.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, it is plain that Senator Root holds that the right of the United States is paramount in navigation.

I have here the final report of the National Waterways Commission, and I find that on that commission there were Theodore E. Burton, JACOB H. GALLINGER, Samuel H. Piles, WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, F. McL. SIMMONS, JAMES P. CLARKE, William Lorimer, on the part of the Senate, and on the part of the House of Representatives D. S. Alexander, Frederick S. Stevens, Irvin P. Wanger, STEPHEN M. SPARKMAN, and JOHN A. MOON. The above-named distinguished Senators and Representatives made an investigation of this matter, and I should like, in connection with this, to insert their opinion. Among other things, on page 44 of this report, it is stated by them:

THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF CONGRESS TO CONTROL WATERCOURSES.

Ownership of water: Perhaps there is no subject of legal interest concerning which there has been a more extended or more fruitless discussion than the ownership of water. Under the common law it is the property of no one, although the rules for its beneficial use are carefully enunciated in a long line of decisions. Blackstone says in his Commentaries:

"But after all there are some few things which, notwithstanding the general introduction and continuance of property, must still unavoidably remain in common * * * such are the elements of light, air, and water."

In a majority of the States of the Union the common law of waters prevails. Some of the Western States have proclaimed either by provisions of their constitutions or by statute that the water of every natural stream or lake is the property of the public; others declare it to be the property of the State, which is undoubtedly to be interpreted as meaning the property of the State in trust for its beneficial use by the people.

The bed of the stream: There is also extreme diversity of opinion and wide variation of laws and rules in the different States respecting the ownership of the bed of the stream. In some States the fee runs to high-water mark, in others to low-water mark, and in still others to the thread of the stream. Under the first two conditions the ownership of the bed of the stream undoubtedly rests in the State. However, as long as the Federal Government has a right of easement over the bed of the stream for the purpose of navigation and all purposes related thereto, it is largely a matter of incidental interest in whom the title vests, and it is difficult to see how it materially affects the right of the Government to exercise control of the stream. Whatever rights the several States enjoy because of their ownership of the bed of the stream or the waters thereof, and whatever right to the beneficial use of the natural and continued flow of the stream may vest in riparian owners, must admittedly be exercised subject to the paramount right of the Federal Government to exercise its sovereign jurisdiction over the streams for the protection or promotion of navigation.

Federal authority paramount: The nature and extent of the rights enjoyed by the States and riparian owners will evidently depend on the nature and extent of control exercised by the sovereign authority. The narrowest possible view would be for the Federal Government to limit its activity to matters that immediately and directly affect questions of navigation in those parts of a stream which are actually navigable. That the Government may, however, constitutionally extend its jurisdiction to questions more remotely connected with the rights of navigation, or even wholly unrelated, can hardly be denied.

The commerce clause: It may not be out of place to refer briefly to the constitutional authority on which the power of Congress over streams rests and to the decisions of the courts which in various particulars have established, defined, and amplified the scope of Federal jurisdiction. Fundamentally, of course, the authority of Congress is derived from the commerce clause of the Constitution, which delegates to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." (Art. I, sec. 8, clause 3.)

And again, on page 45, they state:

The commerce clause includes control of navigable streams. The power of Congress over navigation, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, was recognized from the beginning. At the time the Constitution was adopted it was perfectly evident that the most important agency of commerce then in existence was that of shipping, especially our merchant marine. It is quite probable this was the particular thing in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when they incorporated the commerce clause into that document. This question did, however, come up for court determination. It was one of the particular questions before the court in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), and it was there held that the term "navigation" was just as effectually contained in the meaning of the phrase "to regulate commerce" as though the word were actually used. In fact the court suggested that it was more fully and more comprehensively included than would have been the case if the word had been specifically used. This interpretation is undoubtedly correct, because the term "navigation" as an element of a larger conception is subject to no narrow limits of definition. Mr. Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case above cited, remarked:

"The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation within the limits of every State in the Union, so far as that navigation may be in any manner connected with commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with the Indian tribes" (p. 197).

With respect to the scope of the power given to Congress in relation to the control of commerce he says:

"This power, like all others invested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution" (p. 196).

I desire to include in my remarks the marked passages of this report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To enforce this prohibition, suitable penalties were provided. Subsequent to this enactment the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. constructed a dam in the Rio Grande at a point considerably above the limit of its navigability. It was intended to divert the waters impounded by the dam for purposes of irrigation. The United States, through its district attorney, began proceedings to enjoin the construction of the dam and diversion of the water. This case put squarely before the court the question of the nature and extent of the control which Congress may exert over nonnavigable streams. Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language:

"It is urged that the true construction of this act limits its applicability to obstructions in the navigable portion of a navigable stream, and that as it appears that although the Rio Grande may be navigable in the Territory of New Mexico, this statute has no applicability. The language is general and must be given full scope. It is not a prohibition of any obstruction to the navigation, but any obstruction to the navigable capacity, and anything, wherever done or however done, within the limits of the jurisdiction of the United States which tends to destroy the navigable capacity of one of the navigable waters of the United States, is within the terms of the prohibition. Evidently Congress, perceiving that the time had come when the growing interests of commerce required that the navigable waters of the United States should be subjected to the direct control of the National Government, and that nothing should be done by any State tending to destroy that navigability without the explicit assent of the National Government, enacted the statute in question. And it would be to improperly ignore the scope of this language to limit it to the acts done within the very limits of navigation of a navigable stream."

There can be no doubt since the rendering of this decision that the authority of Congress reaches to the remotest sources in the mountains of every navigable stream. It could hardly be said that any stream, no matter how small, which contributed its waters to a navigable watercourse did not, at least to some extent, affect its navigable capacity. Make it as small as you will, and yet it will be difficult for the courts to say that Congress had no right to exercise its jurisdiction.

* * * * * * *

Congress may withhold its permit or grant with conditions: It is certainly safe to assume that the permit of Congress is very generally necessary. In every case where the construction of a dam or the diversion of water would be illegal or unwarranted without the consent of Congress it would seem to be the legal as well as the logical consequence that if Congress may forbid such construction or diversion it may also impose as a condition of its grant any terms whatsoever not in themselves involving a violation of the Constitution. Neither does it seem essential that the conditions imposed shall relate to purposes of navigation. Congress has made it a condition of its permit to construct a bridge—(1) "That the grantee shall not charge more than a certain price for the carriage of munitions of war, United States mails, or troops"; (2) "that it shall admit a joint occupancy by other railroads upon certain terms."

These and similar conditions have been upheld by the court. (See Stockton v. Baltimore Co., 32 Fed., 9; The Clinton Bridge, 10 Wall., 454; Canada Southern Ry. Co. v. International Bridge Co., 8 Fed., 190; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 725; County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S., 691.

* * * * * * * *

Congress in the exercise of any constitutional power may perform any function incidental thereof. Congress may, nevertheless, possess full power to control the business of its grantee, so far as the public interest may require, entirely free from any interference by the State or municipality, upon quite a different consideration. In the exercise of any legitimate power it has been repeatedly held that Congress may exercise any necessarily incidental function. For example, it has been held in the case of California v. The Central Pacific Railroad Co. (127 U. S., 1) that "Congress has authority in the exercise of its powers to regulate commerce among the several States, to construct, or authorize individuals or corporations to construct, railroads across the States and Territories of the United States."

* * * * * * * *

Federal control desirable: The above survey of the powers which Congress has over the waterways of the country and questions incidental thereto admittedly indicates the extreme limit to which Congress may go under present decisions of the courts. But it is not to be supposed that Congress would be tempted to invade a field of activity which it could only enter by indirect methods unless it were perfectly evident and generally agreed that it was in the public interest to do so. It is well, however, that there should be no misunderstanding as to the extent of the authority of Congress if it should become necessary or expedient to exercise its full powers. With the increasing unity of our national life and the growing necessity of securing for human needs the maximum beneficial use of the waters of every stream, it will become increasingly necessary to treat every stream, with all its tributaries, as a unit. In the nature of the case so comprehensive, a policy could be successfully administered only by the Federal Government, and, consequently, the eventual desirability of Federal control is easy to predict.

Mr. HUSTING. Right in this connection, I have the opinion in the Dunbar case, which disposes, to my mind, absolutely of the riparian proposition. The court holds in that case that the United States can step in, take the power, and use it, not only for the purpose of improving navigation but for the purpose of taking power from the water not used for the purpose of navigation, and sell it and put the money in the Treasury. If it can do that it can delegate that power to somebody else. It does seem to me from the reading of this opinion and by the decisions of the Supreme Court—innumerable decisions—that the conclusion must be reached that was reached by the Waterways Commission, that was advanced by ex-Senator Root, that the right of the Government to control navigation is paramount—not only paramount to that of the States, but paramount to the rights of any riparian owner; and not only that, but such rights being paramount, the riparian owner's property is no property in the proper sense of the word at all, but he is a mere tenant by sufferance, who can be ousted at any moment by act of Congress and without his day in court and the United States can take his property.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire opinion in the Chandler-Dunbar case be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, the right of the States to control navigation is almost on the same plane. They may exercise that right so long as the Government has not sought to do it, but the moment the Government steps in the right of the States as to that must give way. It gives way because of the constitutional power vested in the United States by the States through the Constitution. Why should it not be so? Our navigable streams are merely a part of one great system. Our watersheds between the two coasts, between the ranges of mountains, are one vast watershed, the waters of which make their exit through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River or the Mississippi River. They flow south or east. It is perfectly obvious that no State can deal with this problem of navigation in any adequate way. The States can only do it piecemeal; and the only way that any State can develop adequately these immense waterways—whether it is done now or in a century from now—can only be done through the United States; and if the United States ever expects to accomplish anything of that kind, it must not dispose of its sovereign rights to individuals or to States, else when it gets ready to act it will find itself blocked on all sides from doing that which at one time it had a constitutional right to do, but which right it thoughtlessly and unwisely abandoned.

So it does seem to me as if the question of constitutional right is disposed of, and that the only remaining question, then, would be whether it is good policy to do this, that, or some other thing. I favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

[S. Doc. No. 51, 63d Cong., 1st sess.]

WATER POWER.

OPINION OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE CASE OF THE UNITED STATES, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, V. THE CHANDLER-DUNBAR WATER POWER CO. ET AL.

(Nos. 783, 784, 785, and 786.—October term, 1912.)

783. The United States, plaintiff in error, v. The Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. et al.

784. The Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., plaintiff in error, v. The United States.

785. St. Marys Power Co., plaintiff in error, v. The United States.

786. Clarence M. Brown, sole receiver of the Michigan Lake Superior Power Co., plaintiff in error, v. The United States.

In error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Michigan.

These writs of error are for the purpose of reviewing a judgment in a condemnation proceeding instituted by the United States under the eleventh section of an act of Congress of March 3, 1909, being chapter 264, 35 Statutes, pages 815, 820. The section referred to is as follows:

"SEC. 11. That the ownership in fee simple absolute by the United States of all lands and property of every kind and description north of the present St. Marys Falls Ship Canal throughout its entire length and lying between said ship canal and the international boundary line at Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, is necessary for the purposes of navigation of said waters and the waters connected therewith.

"The Secretary of War is hereby directed to take proceedings immediately for the acquisition by condemnation or otherwise of all of said lands and property of every kind and description in fee simple absolute. He shall proceed in such taking by filing in the office of the register of deeds of Chippewa County, in the State of Michigan, a writing, stating the purposes for which the same is taken under the provisions of this section, and giving a full description of all the lands and property of every kind and description thus to be taken. After the filing of said writing, and 10 days after publication thereof in one or more newspapers in the city of Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, the United States shall be entitled to and shall take immediate possession of the property described, and may at once proceed with such public works thereon as have been authorized by Congress for the uses of navigation.

"The circuit court of the United States for the western district of Michigan is hereby given exclusive jurisdiction to hear condemnation proceedings and to determine what compensation shall be awarded for property taken under authority of this section. After the taking of any property by the Government of the United States, as herein provided for, the United States, by its proper officials, shall begin condemnation proceedings in the aforesaid court, and the practice shall be in accordance with the practice in the courts of the State of Michigan for the condemnation of lands by the State so far as the same may be followed without conflicting with the provisions hereof. Possession may be taken by the United States prior to a determination by a court of any necessity of taking, and prior to any determination of the amount of compensation.

"Any money payable by the Government under the provisions of this section shall be payable out of any money heretofore authorized or appropriated for the purpose of improving St. Marys River at the falls, Michigan.

"All that part of 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1907, beginning with the words 'and all lands and waters north of the present St. Marys Falls Ship Canal throughout its length,' and ending with the words 'to comply with the provisions of the river and harbor act of 1902, but such lands, if so acquired, shall be obtained without expense to the United States,' is hereby repealed.

"Every permit, license, or authority of every kind, nature, and description heretofore issued or granted by the United States, or any official thereof, to the Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., the Edison-Sault Light & Power Co., the Edison-Sault Electric Co., or the St. Marys Power Co., shall cease and determine and become null and void on January 1, 1911, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and instructed to revoke, cancel, and annul every such permit, license, or authority, to take effect on January 1, 1911.

"The Secretary of War may, in his discretion, permit the Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. and the Edison-Sault Electric Co. to maintain their present works and utilize the water power in said river at said rapids, in so far as the same does not interfere with navigation, or retard the construction of Government works in said river, under such rules or regulations as have been or hereafter shall be imposed by the Secretary of War, until they shall be paid the compensation awarded by the court for their property condemned under the provisions of this section; but said permit shall not extend beyond January 1, 1911.

"The President of the United States is respectfully requested to open negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for the purpose of effectually providing, by suitable treaty with said Government, for maintaining ample water levels for the uses of navigation in the Great Lakes and the waters connected therewith, by the construction of such controlling and remedial works in the connecting rivers and channels of such lakes as may be agreed upon by the said Governments under the provisions of said treaty.

"The Secretary of War is further authorized and instructed to cause to be made a preliminary examination and survey to ascertain and determine a proper plan and the probable expense for constructing in the rapids of the St. Marys River a filling or forebay, from which the ship locks shall be filled: Provided, That such survey shall in no way delay or interfere with the plans for construction already under way."

The notice of condemnation required by the statute was duly given by the Secretary of War and this proceeding was instituted against all the corporations and persons supposed to have any interest in the property sought to be condemned. A jury was waived and the evidence submitted to the court, which, at the request of all the parties, made specific findings of fact and law.

By an agreement, the property of the International Bridge Co. required by the Government was acquired by deed, and later in the progress of the case the property of the Edison-Sault Electric Co. involved in the proceeding was acquired by stipulation. This eliminates from the cases every question except those arising in respect of the compensation to be awarded to the Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., the St. Marys Power Co., and Clarence M. Brown, receiver of the Michigan Lake Superior Power Co. The final judgment of the court was:

1. That the ownership in fee simple absolute by the United States of all lands and property of every kind and description north of the present St. Marys Falls Ship Canal, throughout its entire length and lying between the said ship canal and the international line at Sault Ste. Marie, in the State of Michigan, was necessary for the purposes of navigation of said waters and the waters connected therewith as declared by the act of March 3, 1909.

The compensation awarded was as follows:

(a) To the Chandler-Dunbar Co., $652,332. Of this $550,000 was the estimated value of the water power.

(b) To the St. Marys Falls Power Co., $21,000.

(c) To the Edison-Sault Electric Co., $300,000, which has, however, been settled by stipulation.

(d) To the Michigan Lake Superior Power Co., nothing.

From these awards the Government, the Chandler-Dunbar Co., the St. Marys Falls Power Co., and the Michigan Lake Superior Power Co. have sued out writs of error.

The errors assigned by the United States challenge the allowance of any compensation whatever on account of any water-power right claimed by any of the owners of the condemned upland, and also the principles adopted by the district court for the valuation of the upland taken. The several corporations, who have sued out writs of error, complain of the inadequacy of the award on account of water power claimed to have been taken, and also of the valuation placed upon the several parcels of upland condemned.

The errors assigned by the United States deny that any water power in which the defendants below had any private property right has been taken, and also deny the claim that riparian owners must be compensated for exclusion from the use of the water power inherent in the falls and rapids of the St. Marys River, whether the flow of the river be larger than the needs of navigation or not. The award of $550,000 on account of the claim of the Chandler-Dunbar Co. to the undeveloped water power of the river at the St. Marys Rapids in excess of the supposed requirements of navigation constitutes the prime question in the case, and its importance is increased by the contention of that company that the assessment of damages on that account is grossly inadequate and should have been $3,450,000.

Each of the several plaintiffs in error also challenge the awards made on account of the several parcels of upland taken—the Government insisting that the awards are excessive, and the owners that they are inadequate.

(Mr. Justice Lurton, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:)

From the foregoing it will be seen that the controlling questions are, first, whether the Chandler-Dunbar Co. has any private property in the water-power capacity of the rapids and falls of the St. Marys River which has been "taken" and for which compensation must be made under the fifth amendment to the Constitution; and, second, if so, what is the extent of its water-power right and how shall the compensation be measured?

That compensation must be made for the upland taken is not disputable. The measure of compensation may, in a degree, turn upon the relation of that species of property to the alleged water-power rights claimed by the Chandler-Dunbar Co. We therefore pass for the present the errors assigned which concern the awards made for such upland.

The technical title to the beds of the navigable rivers of the United States is either in the States in which the rivers are situated, or in the owners of the land bordering upon such rivers. Whether in one or the other is a question of local law. (Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1, 31; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605, 624, 632; Scott v. Lattig, 227 U. S., 229.) Upon the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union the bed of the St. Marys River passed to the State, and under the law of that State the conveyance of a tract of land upon a navigable river carriers the title to the middle thread. (Webber v. The Pere Marquette, etc., 62 Mich., 626; Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U. S., 141, 163; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., 209 U. S., 447.)

The technical title of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., therefore, includes the bed of the river opposite its upland on the bank to the middle thread of the stream, being the boundary line at that point between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. Over this bed flows about two-thirds of the volume of water constituting the falls and rapids of the St. Marys River. By reason of that fact and the ownership of the shore the company's claim is that it is the owner of the river and of the inherent power in the falls and rapids, subject only to the public right of navigation. While not denying that this right of navigation is the dominating right, yet the claim is that the United States in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce may not exclude the rights of riparian owners to construct in the river and upon their own submerged lands such appliances as are necessary to control and use the current for commercial purposes, provided only that such structures do not impede or hinder navigation and that the flow of the stream is not so diminished as to leave less than every possible requirement of navigation, present and future. This claim of a proprietary right in the bed of the river and in the flow of the stream over that bed to the extent that such flow is in excess of the wants of navigation constitutes the ground upon which the company asserts that a necessary effect of the act of March 3, 1909, and of the judgment of condemnation in the court below, is a taking from it of a property right or interest of great value, for which, under the fifth amendment, compensation must be made.

This is the view which was entertained by Circuit Judge Dennison in the court below, and is supported by most careful findings of fact and law and an elaborate and able opinion. The question is, therefore, one which from every standpoint deserves careful consideration.

This title of the owner of fast land upon the shore of a navigable river to the bed of the river is at best a qualified one. It is a title which inheres in the ownership of the shore and, unless reserved or excluded by implication, passed with it as a shadow follows a substance, although capable of distinct ownership. It is subordinate to the public right of navigation, and however helpful in protecting the owner against the acts of third parties, is of no avail against the exercise of the great and absolute power of Congress over the improvement of navigable rivers. That power of use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. It includes navigation, and subjects every navigable river to the control of Congress. All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution are admissible. If, on the judgment of Congress, the use of the bottom of the river is proper for the purpose of placing therein structures in aid of navigation, it is not thereby taking private property for a public use, for the owner's title was in its very nature subject to that use in the interest of public navigation. If its judgment be that structures placed in the river and upon such submerged land are an obstruction or hindrance to the proper use of the river for purposes of navigation, it may require their removal and forbid the use of the bed of the river by the owner in any way which in its judgment is injurious to the dominant right of navigation. So, also, it may permit the construction and maintenance of tunnels under or bridges over the river, and may require the removal of every such structure placed there with or without its license, the element of contract out of the way, which it shall require to be removed or altered as an obstruction to navigation. In Gilman v. Philadelphia (3 Wall., 713, 724) this court said:

"Commerce includes navigation. The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the Nation, and subject to all the requisite legislation by Congress. This necessarily includes the power to keep them open and free from any obstructions to their navigation, interposed by the States or otherwise; to remove such obstructions when they exist, and to provide, by such sanctions as they may deem proper, against the occurrence of the evil and for the punishment of offenders. For these purposes Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the States before the adoption of the National Constitution, and which have always existed in the Parliament in England.

"It is for Congress to determine when its full power shall be brought into activity, and as to the regulations and sanctions which shall be provided."

In Gibson v. United States (166 U. S., 269) it is said:

"All navigable waters are under the control of the United States for the purpose of regulating and improving navigation, and although the title to the shore and submerged soil is in the various States and individual owners under them, it is always subject to the servitude in respect of navigation created in favor of the Federal Government by the Constitution."

Thus in Scranton v. Wheeler, supra, the Government constructed a long dike or pier upon such submerged lands in the river here involved for the purpose of aiding its navigation. This cut the riparian owner off from direct access to deep water, and he claimed that his rights had been invaded and his property taken without compensation. This court held that the Government had not "taken" any property which was not primarily subject to the very use to which it had been put, and therefore denied his claim. Touching the nature and character of a riparian owner in the submerged lands in front of his upland bounding upon a public navigable river, such as the St. Marys, this court said:

"The primary use of the water and the lands under them is for the purpose of navigation, and the erection of piers in them to improve navigation for the public is entirely consistent with such use and infringes no right of the owner. Whatever the nature of the interest of a riparian owner in the submerged lands in front of his upland bounding on a public navigable river, his title is not as full and complete as his title to fast land which has no direct connection with the navigation of such waters. It is a qualified title, a bare technical title, not at his absolute disposal, as is his upland, but to be held at all times subordinate to such use of the submerged lands and of the water flowing over them as may be consistent with or demanded by the public right of navigation."

So unfettered is this control of Congress over the navigable streams of the country that its judgment as to whether a construction in or over such a river is or is not an obstacle and a hindrance to navigation is conclusive. Such judgment and determination is the exercise of legislative power in respect of a subject wholly within its control.

In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co. (18 How., 421, 430) this court, upon the facts in evidence, held that a bridge over the Ohio River, constructed under an act of the State of Virginia, created an obstruction to navigation and was a nuisance which should be removed. Before the decree was executed Congress declared the bridge a lawful structure and not an obstruction. This court thereupon refused to issue a mandate for carrying into effect its own decree, saying:

"Although it may still be an obstruction in fact, it is not so in contemplation of law. We have already said—and the principle is undoubted—that the act of the Legislature of Virginia conferred full authority to erect and maintain the bridge, subject to the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate the navigation of the river. That body having in the exercise of this power regulated the navigation consistent with its preservation and continuation, the authority to maintain it would seem to be complete. That authority combines the concurrent power of both governments, State and Federal, which, if not sufficient, certainly none can be found in our system of government."

In Philadelphia v. Stimson, supra, and in Union Bridge Co. v. United States (204 U. S., 364) many of the cases are cited and reviewed, and we need add nothing more to the discussion.

The conclusion to be drawn is that the question of whether the proper regulation of navigation of this river at the place in question required that no construction of any kind should be placed or continued in the river by riparian owners and whether the whole flow of the stream should be conserved for the use and safety of navigation are questions legislative in character; and when Congress determined, as it did by the act of March 3, 1909, that the whole river between the American bank and the international line, as well as all of the upland north of the present ship canal, throughout its entire length was "necessary for the purposes of navigation of said waters and the waters connected therewith," that determination was conclusive.

So much of the zone covered by this declaration as consisted of fast land upon the banks of the river or in islands which were private property is, of course, to be paid for. But the flow of the stream was in no sense private property, and there is no room for a judicial review of the judgment of Congress that the flow of the river is not in excess of any possible need of navigation or for a determination that if in excess the riparian owners had any private property right in such excess which must be paid for if they have been excluded from the use of the same.

That Congress did not act arbitrarily in determining that "for the purposes of navigation of said waters and the waters connected therewith," the whole flow of the stream should be devoted exclusively to that end, is most evident when we consider the character of this stream and its relation to the whole problem of lake navigation. The river St. Marys is the only outlet for the waters of Lake Superior. The stretch of water called the falls and rapids of the river is about 3,000 feet long and from bank to bank has a width of about 4,000 feet. About two-thirds of the volume of the stream flows over the submerged lands of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., the rest over like lands on the Canadian side of the boundary. The fall in the rapids is about 18 feet. This turbulent water, substantially unnavigable without the artificial aid of canals around the stream, constitutes both a tremendous obstacle to navigation and an equally great source of water power if devoted to commercial purposes. That the wider needs of navigation might not be hindered by the presence in the river of the construction works necessary to use it for the development of water power for commercial uses under private ownership was the judgment and determination of Congress. There was also present in the minds of Congress the necessity of controlling the overflow from Lake Superior, which averages some 64,000 cubic feet per second. That outflow has great influence both upon the water level of Lake Superior and also upon the level of the great system of lakes below which receive that outflow. A difference of a foot in the level of Lake Superior may influence adversely access to the harbors on that lake. The same fall in the water level of the lower lakes will perceptibly affect access to their ports. This was a matter of international consideration, for Canada, as well as the United States, was interested in the control and regulation of the lake water levels. And so we find in the act of 1909 a request that the President of the United States will open negotiations with the Government of Great Britain "for the purpose of effectually providing, by suitable treaty, for maintaining ample water levels for the uses of navigation in the Great Lakes and the waters connected therewith by the construction of such controlling and remedial works in the connecting rivers and channels of such lakes as may be agreed upon by the said Governments under the provisions of said treaty."

The falls and rapids are at the exit of the river from the lake. Millions of public money have already been expended in construction of canals and locks by this Government upon the American side and by the Canadian Government upon its own side of the rapids, as a means by which water craft may pass around the falls and rapids in the river. The commerce using these facilities has increased by leaps and bounds. The first canal had hardly been finished before it became inadequate. A second upon the American side was constructed parallel with the first. The two together are insufficient though the canal upon the Canadian side accommodates much of the commerce. The main purpose of the act of 1909 was to clear the way for generally widening and enlarging facilities for the ever-growing commerce of the Great Lakes. The act, therefore, looks to the construction of one or more canals and locks, paralleling those in use, and directs a survey "to ascertain and determine the proper plan * * * for constructing in the rapids * * * a filling basin or forebay from which the ship locks may be filled."

The upland belonging to the Chandler-Dunbar Co. consists of a strip of land some 2,500 feet long and from 50 to 150 feet wide. It borders upon the river on one side and on the Government canal strip on the other. Under permits from the Secretary of War, revokable at will, it placed in the rapids, in connection with its upland facilities, the necessary dams, dikes, and forebays for the purpose of controlling the current and using its power for commercial purposes, and has been for some years engaged in using and selling water power. What it did was by the revocable permission of the Secretary of War, and every such permit or license was revoked by the act of 1909. (See act of Sept. 19, 1890, 26 Stat., pp. 426, 454, forbidding the construction of any dam, pier, or breakwater in any navigable river without permission of the Secretary of War, or the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by law, "to the navigable capacity of such rivers." See also, the later act of Mar. 3, 1899, 30 Stat., pp. 1151, 1155, and United States v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co., 174 U. S., 690, construing and applying the act of 1890.) That it did not thereby acquire any right to maintain these constructions in the river longer than the Government should continue the license needs no argument. They were placed in the river under a permit which the company knew was likely to be revoked at any time. There is nothing in the facts which savors of estoppel in law or equity. The suggestion by counsel that the act of 1909 contemplates that the owner should be compensated not only for its tangible property, movable or real, but for its loss and damage by the discontinuance of the company's license and its exclusion from the right to use the water power inherent in the falls and rapids for commercial purposes is without merit. The provisions of the act in respect of compensation apply only to compensation for such "property described" as shall be held private property taken for public uses. Unless, therefore, the water-power rights asserted by the Chandler-Dunbar Co. are determined to be private property the court below was not authorized to award compensation for such rights.

It is a little difficult to understand the basis for the claim that in appropriating the upland bordering upon this stretch of water, the Government not only takes the land but also the great water power which potentially exists in the river. The broad claim that the water power of the stream is appurtenant to the bank owned by it, and not dependent upon ownership of the soil over which the river flows has been advanced. But whether this private right to the use of the flow of the water and flow of the stream be based upon the qualified title which the company had to the bed of the river over which it flows or the ownership of land bordering upon the river, is of no prime importance. In neither event can there be said to arise any ownership of the river. Ownership of a private stream wholly upon the lands of an individual is conceivable; but that the running water in a great navigable stream is capable of private ownership is inconceivable.

Whatever substantial private property rights exist in the flow of the stream must come from some right which that company has to construct and maintain such works in the river, such as dams, walls, dikes, etc., essential to the utilization of the power of the stream for commercial purposes. We may put out of view altogether the class of cases which deal with the right of riparian owners upon a nonnavigable stream to the use and enjoyment of the stream and its waters. The use of the fall of such a stream for the production of power may be a reasonable use consistent with the rights of those above and below. The necessary dam to use the power might completely obstruct the stream, but if the effect was not injurious to the property of those above or to the equal rights of those below, none could complain, since no public interest would be affected. We may also lay out of consideration the cases cited which deal with the rights of riparian owners upon navigable or nonnavigable streams as between each other. Nor need we consider cases cited which deal with the rights of riparian owners under State laws and private or public charters conferring rights. That riparian owners upon public navigable rivers have in addition to the rights common to the public certain rights to the use and enjoyment of the stream, which are incident to such ownership of the bank, must be conceded. These additional rights are not dependent upon title to the soil over which the river flows, but are incident to ownership upon the bank. Among these rights of use and enjoyment is the right, as against other riparian owners, to have the stream come to them substantially in its natural state, both in quantity and quality. They have also the right of access to deep water, and when not forbidden by public law may construct for this purpose wharves, docks, and piers in the shallow water of the shore. But every such structure in the water of a navigable river is subordinate to the right of navigation and subject to the obligation to suffer the consequences of the improvement of navigation, and must be removed if Congress in the assertion of its power over navigation shall determine that their continuance is detrimental to the public interest in the navigation of the river. (Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S., 269; Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S., 635.) It is for Congress to decide what is and what is not an obstruction to navigation. (Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 18 How., 421; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S., 364; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605.)

To utilize the rapids and falls of the river which flows by the upland of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., it has been and will be necessary to construct and maintain in the river the structures necessary to control and direct the flow so that it may be used for commercial purposes. The thirty-fourth finding of fact includes this:

"For about 20 years the Chandler-Dunbar Co., or its predecessors or some one claiming under it, has been developing power at this part of the rapids. This was accomplished by a short transverse dam near the lower boundary of its land extending out a short distance into the stream and then extending up along the bed of the stream (substantially) parallel to the bank up to the head of the rapids. This dam or wall toward its upper end diverged out into the stream the better to divert water into the headrace and into the fore bay formed by its lower part. Earlier structures of this character were replaced about 1901 by those more extensive ones which existed when this condemnation was made. While considerable in extent and cost, they are inconsiderable as compared with the structures now proposed to utilize the whole power, and they were, comparatively speaking, along the bank rather than across the stream."

The seventy-first finding of fact was in these words:

"All the development works ever constructed upon the Chandler-Dunbar submerged lands by anyone have been constructed after obtaining from the Secretary of War a permit therefor, and each such permit has been expressly revocable by right of revocation reserved on its face, to be exercised with or without cause. Each such permit was revoked before the commencement of this proceeding."

Upon what principle can it be said that in requiring the removal of the development works which were in the river upon sufferance Congress has taken private property for public use without compensation? In deciding that a necessity existed for absolute control of the river at the rapids, Congress has, of course, excluded, until it changes the law, every such construction as a hindrance to its plans and purposes for the betterment of navigation. The qualified title to the bed of the river affords no ground for any claim of a right to construct and maintain therein any structure which Congress has by the act of 1909 decided, in effect, to be an obstruction to navigation and a hindrance to its plans for improvement. That title is absolutely subordinate to the right of navigation and no right of private property would have been invaded if such submerged lands were occupied by structures in aid of navigation or kept free from such obstructions in the interest of navigation. (Scranton v. Wheeler, supra; Hawkins Light House Cases, 39 Fed., 83.) We need not consider whether the entire flow of the river is necessary for the purposes of navigation, or whether there is a surplus which is to be paid for, if the Chandler-Dunbar Co. is to be excluded from the commercial use of that surplus. The answer is found in the fact that Congress has determined that the stream from the upland taken to the international boundary is necessary for the purposes of navigation. That determination operates to exclude from the river forever the structures necessary for the commercial use of the water power. That it does not deprive the Chandler-Dunbar Co. of private property rights follows from the considerations before stated.

It is said that the twelfth section of the act of 1909 authorizes the Secretary of War to lease, upon terms agreed upon, any excess of water power which results from the conservation of the flow of the river and the works which the Government may construct. This, it is said, is a taking of private property for commercial uses and not for the improvement of navigation. But, aside from the exclusive public purpose declared by the eleventh section of the act, the twelfth section declares that the conservation of the flow of the river is "primarily for the benefit of navigation and incidentally for the purpose of having the water power developed, either for the direct use of the United States or by lease * * * through the Secretary of War."

If the primary purpose is legitimate, we can see no sound objection to leasing any excess of power over the needs of the Government. The practice is not unusual in respect to similar public works constructed by State governments. In Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay, etc., Canal (142 U. S., 254, 273), respecting a Wisconsin act to which this objection was made, the court said:

"But if, in the erection of a public dam for a recognized public purpose, there is necessarily produced a surplus of water which may properly be used for manufacturing purposes, there is no sound reason why the State may not retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement. Indeed, it might become very necessary to retain the disposition of it in its own hands in order to preserve at all times a sufficient supply for the purposes of navigation. If the riparian owners were allowed to tap the pond at different places and draw off the water for their own use, serious consequences might arise, not only in connection with the public demand for the purposes of navigation, but between the riparian owners themselves as to the proper proportion each was entitled to draw—controversies which could only be avoided by the State reserving to itself the immediate supervision of the entire supply. As there is no need of the surplus running to waste, there was nothing objectionable in permitting the State to let out the use of it to private parties and thus reimburse itself for the expenses of the improvement."

It is, at best, not clear how the Chandler-Dunbar Co. can be heard to object to the selling of any excess of water power which may result from the construction of such controlling or remedial works as shall be found advisable for the improvement of navigation, inasmuch as it had no property right in the river which had been "taken." It has, therefore, no interest whether the Government permit the excess of power to go to waste or make it the means of producing some return upon the great expenditure.

The conclusion, therefore, is that the court below erred in awarding $550,000, or any other sum, for the value of what is called "raw water"—that is, the present money value of the rapids and falls to the Chandler-Dunbar Co. as riparian owners of the shore and appurtenant submerged land.

Coming now to the award for the upland taken:

The court below awarded to the Chandler-Dunbar Co. on this account—

(a) For the narrow strip of upland bordering on the river, having an area of something more than 8 acres, excluding the small parcels described in the pleadings and judgment as claims 95 and 96, $65,000, less 7 per cent of that sum on account of Portage Street, which the court later found belonged to the United States and not to that company	$60,450
(b) For the small parcels covered by claims 95 and 96	25,000
(c) For a half interest in lot on bridge property	338

These awards include certain sums for special values. The value of the upland strip, fixed at $60,450, was arrived at in this manner:

(a) For its value, including railroad sidetracks, buildings, and cable terminal, including also its use, "wholly disconnected with power development or public improvement—that is to say, for all general purposes, like residences or hotels, factory sites, disconnected with water power, etc.—$20,000."

(b) For use as factory site "in connection with the development of 6,500 horsepower, either as a single site or for several factories to use the surplus of 6,500 horsepower not now used in the city, an additional value of $20,000."

(c) For use for canal and lock purposes, an additional value of $25,000.

The small parcels constituting claims 95 and 96 were valued at $25,000.

These two parcels seem to have been connected by a costly fill. They fronted upon deep water above the head of the rapids. They had therefore a special value for wharves, docks, etc., and had been so used. The gross sum awarded included the following elements:

(a) For general wharfage, dock, and warehouse purposes, disconnected with development of power in the rapids, $10,000.

(b) For its special value for canal and lock purposes an additional sum of $10,000.

(c) In connection with the canal along the rapids, if used as a part of the development of 4,500 (6,500) horsepower, an additional value of $5,000.

The United States excepted to the additional value allowed in consequence of the availability of these parcels in connection with the water power supposed to be the property of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., and supposed to have been taken by the Government in this case. It also excepted to so much of the wards as constituted an additional value by reason of availability for lock and canal purposes.

These exceptions, so far as they complain of the additional value to be attached to these parcels for use as factory sites in connection with the development of horsepower by the Chandler-Dunbar Co., must be sustained. These "additional" values were based upon the erroneous hypothesis that that company had a private property interest in the water power of the river, not possibly needed now or in the future for purposes of navigation, and that that excess or surplus water was capable, by some extension of their works already in the river, of producing 6,500 horsepower.

Having decided that the Chandler-Dunbar Co. as riparian owners had no such vested property right in the water power inherent in the falls and rapids of the river, and no right to place in the river the works essential to any practical use of the flow of the river, the Government can not be justly required to pay for an element of value which did not inhere in these parcels as upland. The Government had dominion over the water power of the rapids and falls and can not be required to pay any hypothetical additional value to a riparian owner who had no right to appropriate the current to his own commercial use. These additional values represent, therefore, no actual loss and there would be no justice in paying for a loss suffered by no one in fact.

"The requirement of the fifth amendment is satisfied when the owner is paid for what is taken from him. The question is, What has the owner lost, and not what has the taker gained." (Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Boston, 217 U. S., 189, 194, 195.)

Neither can consideration be given to probable advancement in the value of such riparian property by reason of the works to be constructed in the river by the Government, or the use to which the flow of the stream might be directed by the Government. The value should be fixed as of the date of the proceedings and with reference to the loss the owner sustains, considering the property in its condition and situation at the time it is taken and not as enhanced by the purpose for which it was taken. (Kerr v. Park Commissioners, 117 U. S., 379, 387; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282, 304, 305.)

The exception taken to the inclusion as an element of value of the availability of these parcels of land for lock and canal purposes must be overruled. That this land had a prospective value for the purpose of constructing a canal and lock parallel with those in use had passed beyond the region of the purely conjectural or speculative. That one or more additional parallel canals and locks would be needed to meet the increasing demands of lake traffic was an immediate probability. This land was the only land available for the purpose. It included all the land between the canals in use and the bank of the river. Although it is not proper to estimate land condemned for public purposes by the public necessities or its worth to the public for such purpose, it is proper to consider the fact that the property is so situated that it will probably be desired and available for such a purpose. (Lewis on Eminent Domain, sec. 707; Patterson v. Boom Co., 98 U. S., 403, 408; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga., 30; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn., 510; Sargent v. Merrimac, 196 Mass., 171.) Patterson v. Boom Co. was this: A boom company sought to condemn three small islands in the Mississippi River so situated with reference to each other and the river bank as to be peculiarly adapted to form a boom a mile in length. The question in the case was whether their adaptability for that purpose gave the property a special value which might be considered. This court held that the adaptability of the land for the purposes of a boom was an element which should be considered in estimating the value of the lands condemned. The court said, touching the rule for estimating damages in such cases:

"So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisement in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule, but as a general thing we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future."

In Shoemaker v. United States, supra, lands were condemned for park purposes. In the court below the commissioners were instructed to estimate each piece of land at its market value and that "the market value of the land includes its value for any use to which it may be put and all the uses to which it is adapted, and not merely the condition in which it is at the present time and the use to which it is now applied by the owner; * * * that if, by reason of its location, its surroundings, its natural advantages, its artificial improvement, or its intrinsic character, it is peculiarly adapted to some particular use—e. g., to the use of a public park—all the circumstances which make up this adaptability may be shown, and the fact of such adaptation may be taken into consideration in estimating the compensation."

The court approved this instruction.

The Chandler-Dunbar Co. has also assigned as error the denial of any award on account of a portion of Portage Street to which it claimed title. The title to that parcel has never passed out of the United States. It was part of a street laid off by a survey made of the village of Sault Ste. Marie, a town which had grown up on public land of the United States. But that survey was never carried into a patent and the village never accepted this part of the street. Thus abandoned, it was occupied for a time by the Chandler-Dunbar Co., but not long enough to acquire title. The court did not err in holding that the company had acquired no title and that title was already in the United States.

The award to the St. Marys Power Co. as owner of island No. 5 is excepted to. The value of that island was fixed at $21,000. That amount was reached, as shown by the seventieth finding of fact, in this manner:

(a) As a base value, for general purposes, as for a cottage or fishing station	$1,000
(b) As a strategic value, growing out of the extent to which it may control or block the most available development by upstream owners	15,000
(c) As an additional value, by reason of its special suitability for lock or canal purposes	5,000

This Island No. 5, otherwise known as Oshawano Island, is on the American edge of the rapids and below the Chandler-Dunbar property and opposite that part of the shore belonging to the United States. It has an area of about one-third of an acre. The court found that it had no appreciable water power which was in any sense appurtenant, and so no allowance was made on that account. Because none was made the St. Marys Power Co. sued out a writ of error. The reasons which have induced us to deny such an allowance in respect of upland upon the bank of the river require the assignment referred to to be held bad. The court below held, however, that the island had value in other ways, being those mentioned above. In respect to the allowance of $15,000 as its "strategic value" the court below, in its opinion, said:

"Owing to its location this property had, and always has had, a strategic value with reference to any general scheme of water development in the river and because it must be included as a tailrace site, if not otherwise, in any completely efficient plan of development by any owner, private or public. This value is denied because it is, as Government counsel say, of the 'hold up' character. It should not be permitted to assume the latter character, nor should the fair strategic value be denied because there might be an attempt at exaggeration or abuse. I fix this so-called strategic value at $10,000 (afterwards raised to $15,000), and it should be awarded under the circumstances of this case to whomsoever the owner may be."

This allowance has no solid basis upon which it may stand. That the property may have to the public a greater value than its fair market value affords no just criterion for estimating what the owner should receive. It is not proper to attribute to it any part of the value which might result from a consideration of its value as a necessary part of a comprehensive system of river improvement which should include the river and the upland upon the shore adjacent. The ownership is not the same. The principle applied in Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Boston (217 U. S., 189) is applicable. In that case it appeared that one person owned the land condemned subject to servitudes to others. It was sought to have damages assessed upon a bill in which all of the interests joined for the purpose of having a lump sum awarded, to be divided as the parties might or had agreed. If this could be done, it was agreed that the estate, considered as the sole unencumbered estate of a single person, was worth many times more than if the damage should be assessed according to the condition of the title at the time. This court held that the requirement of compensation when land is taken for a public purpose "does not require a disregard of the mode of ownership. It does not require a parcel of land to be valued as an unencumbered whole."

The "strategic value" for which $15,000 has been allowed is altogether speculative. It is based not upon the actual market value for all reasonable uses and demands, but the possible worth of the property to the Government.

A "strategic value" might be realized by a price fixed by the necessities of one person buying from another, free to sell, or refuse, as the price suited. But in a condemnation proceeding the value of the property to the Government for its particular use is not a criterion. The owner must be compensated for what is taken from him, but that is done when he is paid its fair market value for all available uses and purposes. (Lewis, Eminent Domain, 3d ed., sec. 706; Moulton v. Newbury Water Co., 137 Mass., 163, 167; United States v. Seufert Bros. Co., 78 Fed., 520; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn., 510, 514; United States v. Honolulu Co., 122 Fed., 581.)

The exception must be sustained.

One other assignment by the St. Marys Power Co. needs to be specially noticed. The title to Oshawano Island is in litigation between the United States and the St. Marys Power Co. For this reason the award to that company was ordered to remain in the registry of the court until that litigation was ended. The St. Marys Power Co. contends that when the United States sought the condemnation of the property in this proceeding it thereby conceded the title to be in it. But the pleadings show that no such concession was made. The state of the title and of the pending litigation was set up and we think all rights were thereby reserved.

The assignments of error by the Michigan Lake Superior Power Co. must be overruled. No property, real or hypothetical, has been taken from it.

Other assignments of error by one or another of the several plaintiffs in error need not be specially noticed. They are all overruled as either covered by the views we have expressed or as having no merit.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cases remanded with direction to enter a judgment in accordance with this opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this question has been discussed from the viewpoint of the committee very fully and elaborately by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and I am not going to repeat the argument made by him. All I wish to say is that this is an amendment to strike out the entire section 6 of the bill and to substitute for it another section prepared by the Senator from Nebraska, materially different from it, and I think materially different from other provisions of the bill. Section 6 as now formulated conforms to and dovetails into the whole bill. This amendment would present questions entirely different. For that reason, and because there are some very objectionable modifications made in the amendment, on behalf of the committee I wish to say that I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] embodies the principle of an amendment offered by myself, which has not yet been acted upon. Will the Senator from Tennessee indicate when we might take that amendment up? I am in no hurry about it at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think we might take it up this afternoon, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] also has an amendment, which is very much like the amendment to which the Senator from Montana refers.

Mr. WALSH. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the expectation that the Senator from Tennessee will yet become convinced of the wisdom of accepting the amendment which I have tendered to section 6.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Montana that he has presented his amendment and explained it fully. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa might come up; we could have an explanation from him, and then we should have the whole matter before the Senate. That is a mere suggestion, however. I do not care which amendment comes first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been requested on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PAGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to say that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a general pair with that Senator. If he were present, I should vote "nay." As he is not present, I will withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Arizona and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I should like to ask if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Broussard	Hollis	Kern	Poindexter
Chamberlain	Husting	Lane	Sheppard
Cummins	James	Martine, N. J.	Sherman
Gore	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Thompson

NAYS—39.

Ashurst	Lodge	Pomerene	Swanson
Bankhead	McCumber	Robinson	Thomas
Beckham	McLean	Shafroth	Tillman
Brandegee	Martin, Va.	Shields	Underwood
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons	Vardaman
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.	Warren
Jones	Oliver	Smith, Mich.	Weeks
Lee, Md.	Overman	Smith, S. C.	Works

NOT VOTING—41.

Borah	Curtis	La Follette	Shively
Brady	Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	du Pont	Lewis	Sterling
Burleigh	Fall	Newlands	Stone
Catron	Goff	Owen	Sutherland
Chilton	Gronna	Penrose	Townsend
Clapp	Harding	Phelan	Wadsworth
Clark, Wyo.	Hardwick	Pittman	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Hitchcock	Ransdell
Colt	Hughes	Reed
Culberson	Kenyon	Saulsbury

So the amendment of Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It consists of a series of amendments, but they all cover the same subject, and I offer them all at the same time as one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 23, after the word "the" and before the word "property," it is proposed to insert the word "physical"; on page 10, in line 2, to strike out the words "or acquired"; on page 10, in line 5, after the word "said," to insert the word "physical"; and, after the word "the" and before the word "cost," to insert the word "original"; and, after the word "cost," to insert the words "without interest"; on page 10, in line 6, to strike out the words "or other aids to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or other structures used in"; also to strike out the words "all other"; on page 10, in line 7, to strike out the words "capital expenditures" and insert, after the words "United States," "and valuable and serviceable for no other purpose"; on page 10, to strike out all after the words "United States" in line 7, down to and including the period in line 12; on page 10, in line 13, after the word "property," to strike out all down to and including the word "contracts" in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof "and the cost of said construction," so as to make the bill, from line 22, page 9, to line 15, page 10, read as follows:

over by the United States of all the physical property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted which are necessary and appurtenant and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said physical property, together with the original cost without interest to the grantee of the lock or locks or other structures used only in navigation and required by the United States and valuable and serviceable for no other purpose. The fair value of said property and the cost of said construction shall be determined by agreement between.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize that the subject presented by this amendment has been carefully debated. It accomplishes the purpose generally sought by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], although I think it accomplishes that purpose in a better and more equitable way.

I may say at this point that I have another amendment, which I will offer as soon as the one read is disposed of, which adds a very material provision to the section and which is altogether new. For the amendment just stated I shall content myself with pointing out in the briefest possible way the obvious objections to the bill as presented by the committee.

There is no Senator here who desires to facilitate, encourage, and stimulate the development of our water powers more than I do; but when it is said that it is necessary that the precise terms provided in this bill shall be given to those who have capital in order to induce them to invest in such business I can not accept the statement without proof. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], in debating the matter a few moments ago, seemed to imply that unless the people who have money to invest in enterprises of this character were given all the privileges which are accorded them in this bill they would not invest their money.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that I do not know any of these men; I have never talked with them; I have never had any conference with them; I do not know whether they would invest their money or not. I took it as a fact that they had not done so under the old law, and that unless in the pending measure, seemingly, at least, better terms were accorded they would not undertake the development work contemplated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, this bill has no relation to the present law at all. I did not assume that the Senator from Colorado had any information upon that point, and, therefore, I said just what I said a moment ago, that anyone who claims that it is necessary to give the proposed grantees all the rights that are in the bill in order to induce the investment of money is speaking without due reflection and without familiarity with the subject. I know, as all other Senators know, that for years millions upon millions of dollars have been invested in enterprises somewhat akin to this without all the protection or safeguards which are here provided for capital.

Mr. President, I venture to say that four-fifths of the public utilities of all the municipalities in the United States have been constructed under franchises not exceeding 50 years in duration, which made no provision whatever for the payment of the property created at the end of the franchise. I know some—a great many, indeed—constructed under a franchise of 25 years without any agreement upon the part of the government to acquire the property and pay its value after the franchise period had expired. I do not assert that this is a wise policy, because inevitably it involves the accumulation of a fund for the replacement of capital at the end of the period, which must reflect itself in the rates that are charged for the service, just as I insisted yesterday that a payment to the General Government for the permission to construct a dam in a navigable stream must find its way into the rates charged for the service.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I am in sympathy with that newer idea that at the end of a given period the property shall be taken over at a fair value. My complaint about this bill is that its provisions give to those who may own the property at the end of the franchise period an unfair value, and that they make, or may make, the public pay twice for the same property. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator states that he knows of a great many instances where companies have undertaken a right to charge for 25 years, and that they have proceeded with the investment. Therefore my criticism that I did not believe they would invest under the conditions of this bill is not likely to be accurate.

Now I want to ask the Senator this question: Does he know of a single instance where a company agreed to build something for navigation that would cost $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, and turn it over and donate it to the Government, and then to undertake to get out of the matter something in the nature of a return for themselves?

Mr. CUMMINS. I never heard of such an instance, because it is not possible that any such instance should have occurred, for we have had no laws under which an instance of that kind could arise.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But under this bill the requirement is that these dams should be built for navigation, and the very initial investment is of that nature which would donate to the Government millions of dollars; and then we expect them, when they are absolutely restricted, to go on with the enterprise, to give $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 to the Government and not recoup it in some way. It seems to me that demonstrates that they would not go into it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado, it seems to me, does not discriminate between the negative of his own propositions and the suggestions I have made. I am not insisting that the Government shall not take over the property at the end of the franchise period. I have just said that I think it is wise that it should do so. But I think it is also wise—and I can not understand why Senators are not willing to approach that question with an open mind, at least—that when the Government does take over the property it shall pay only the fair value of the property.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has declared himself in favor of the newer idea of the Government taking over this property. Does he think it is necessary to insert such a provision as that in this bill? Can not the Government take it over, if any public necessity requires that course, at a future time, without any such provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not in the very least responsible for the general framework of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I have as many differences with it as has the Senator from California; but I am accepting, for the purpose of this amendment, the general idea of the bill, and I am endeavoring to make it as little unjust as possible.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator has declared himself in favor of this proposition. I have never yet heard anybody give any reason why we should make such a provision, or state what benefit could possibly result from a provision that can not take effect for 50 years to come. If the Senator can give any valid reason why that is important or beneficial, I wish he would do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to hear it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can, because I have not made the statement without due reflection. The Senator from California must recollect that I stated it as a general principle. When a municipality grants a franchise for the use of the public streets to a street railway or to an electric light company or to a gas or water company, and limits the franchise to 50 years, as most such franchises are limited, the company which receives the franchise and enters upon the service must do or have one of two things: It must either charge during the period rates which will not only enable it to pay the cost of maintenance and operation but will return a reasonable reward to the capital employed and accumulate a fund that I will call, for brevity, an amortization fund that will at the end of the period replace the capital that has been invested, namely, repay to the stockholders or bondholders, as the case may be, their investments, upon the assumption that the property becomes absolutely worthless, or it must have some arrangement through which the property can become or remain valuable at the end of that time. I believe that the modern method which provides for recapture or retaking at the end of the period is a better method than to add during the period such charges as will create a capital fund and in that way replace the money originally invested.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I am glad to hear the Senator from Iowa make this effort to explain how and why it would be advantageous for the National Government to take over this property at the end of 50 years, but the Senator overlooks the very vital point that, with the use of the water or any dealings with the water or with the rates or anything of the sort, the National Government has nothing whatever to do. Its whole authority is the right to grant the petitioner the privilege of constructing the dam in the stream. The Senator's proposition includes the taking over of property over which the National Government has no jurisdiction, namely, the distributing system; and it seems to me that the case of a city, such as the Senator has mentioned, is not in the least parallel to the situation here.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is right about that in the sense that I attempted to describe a moment ago, and I do not intend to enter upon the discussion which he has so ably carried on in the Senate with regard to the general vice of the attempt which the Government is now making. But we have before us a bill, which apparently will pass, providing that at the end of 50 years this property is to be retaken, and it provides the rule which shall control the Government or the court in valuing the property. The fact that I may agree with the Senator from California that there ought to be no such provision in the bill does not in the least impinge upon my view that, if the country is to acquire the property and is to pay the grantee at the end of the period a certain sum of money, it should pay no more than a fair and equitable amount; and that is the whole purpose of this amendment.

Mr. WORKS. I do not in the least differ with the Senator in that respect; but I have put the question to him as to whether it was a wise thing to take over this property or to provide 50 years in advance that the Government should take over this property under any circumstances. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment. I think he is right upon that proposition, if we are going to be driven to the passage of this bill with some provision of that kind in it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am offering the amendment and I am debating the question upon the assumption that the bill will pass, and that it will pass with the provisions that are now in it, unless we can induce the Senate to modify it so that the United States will not be compelled to pay an unjust and an unfair amount to the grantee.

I was referring, when I was diverted, to the argument of the Senator from Colorado that it was necessary, in order to induce capital to enter these projects, that the extraordinary, as I think, privileges which are here provided for in the way of repayment shall be tendered to any such grantee. For one, I do not believe it. I have no sympathy with the general maxim which declares that capital is timid. On the contrary, it is the most audacious and aggressive element in life, and it will always invest itself wherever there is reasonable hope to believe that profit can be made; and I would not have it otherwise. I want capital to enter the business, and I want capital to be safe and secure. The reason, of course, that we have had no general improvement in water powers in the recent past is that no officer of the Government has had authority to give a grantee a permanent tenure in the stream. No officer of the Government could guarantee that over a certain definite period the rights, whatever they might be, should be exercised; and I do not wonder that men with money have refused to enter a business of this kind if an officer of the Government—the Secretary of the Interior or any other officer—has the right to terminate the permit at any moment that he so desires. That presents an intolerable and an impossible situation, and it is perfectly logical and natural that nothing has been accomplished under a system of that sort. Here we provide a durable tenure of 50 years; and the only remaining question is, What other guaranties or safeguards must we provide in order that capital shall be invested?

I believe, Mr. President, that if an individual or corporation is assured for 50 years the right to enter upon a stream and to use it for the purposes declared in the bill, subject to the regulation of the State or any other governmental power, which could never reduce the charge below a reasonable one, investments would be made if there were no provision for payment for the property at the end of the period. That is the experience of the United States in every like venture; and I am sure very few instances can be found that are inconsistent with the statement I have just made.

I agree, however, that if the grantee is compelled to accumulate during this period a sum that will represent the capital or value of the property at the end of the period, it can only be done through the imposition of such charges to the public as will enable the accumulation to be made; and I, for one, would rather the United States would agree to take the property at the end of the period at a fair value, provided the public has not already paid for it in overcharges or excessive charges, than to allow the grantee to charge those rates that will enable him to accumulate such an amortization fund. So the sole question is, How shall the value of the property be determined?

My objection to the bill as it is begins in line 23, on page 9, in which the property to be valued is described as—

all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted—

And so forth. My suggestion is, and my amendment proposes, that the word "property" shall be qualified and limited by the insertion of the word "physical." It can not be that the Senator from Tennessee, in charge of the bill, intends to allow the physical property of the grantee to be measured by the profits of the business in which it has been engaged; and yet that will be the result if the word "physical" is not introduced. I know there is a provision in the bill that the value of the franchise which is given by the United States shall not be considered, but that is only a small part of the intangible value which this property may have.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator will see now, from the reading of that portion of the bill, that the proposition is to take over not what the Government has allowed the party to construct, but the entire distributing system—everything that is used for the purpose of developing, distributing, and furnishing the power. By what right does the Senator think the Government of the United States can take over the distributing system that is absolutely and completely under the control of the State government?

Mr. CUMMINS. I doubt the right of the United States to do it at all.

Mr. WORKS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is not material to the amendment I am discussing.

Mr. WORKS. It is not material to the amendment, but it is very material to the bill itself, and I am only calling attention to it now as the Senator goes along. What does the Senator suppose the Government of the United States is going to do with the property after it takes it over?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the United States has any right to take over the property it has the right to operate it, to sell it, or to lease it; and that would have to be done, of course, under subsequent legislation.

Mr. WORKS. I suppose the Senator recognizes the fact that if it becomes a public-utility corporation—because that is what it would be—it would be under the regulation of the State. How is the State going to regulate the United States in the supply of power?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize all these difficulties that are being suggested by the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator may recognize them, but I think it is worth while to call the attention of the Senate to that condition of things.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I hope the Senator from California will remember that I am not endeavoring to defend the general policy of the bill. I am simply trying to make it a little better than I believe it to be now, assuming that the general policy which is developed in the bill shall be maintained and that the bill will become a law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. If, in addition to the provision in the bill to the effect that no value shall be assigned to the franchise itself at the end of the period of 50 years, the death of the franchise, it were likewise provided that only the cost of the dam and diversion works and generating works and rights of way and water rights should go to the grantee, what, then, would remain to which the term "physical" could apply?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my answer is that the part of the bill I am now discussing is not limited to cost. I wish it were, because I believe that is fundamentally right.

Mr. WALSH. I understand. If an amendment of that character were attached to the bill, would the Senator then feel that there was any occasion for the insertion of the word "physical," about which he is now speaking?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that if the rule of valuation provided were the cost of the property, then my suggestion as to adding the word "physical" would be utterly immaterial, because the original cost would eliminate all these other values that I am trying to eliminate by the use of the word "physical."

Mr. WALSH. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not attempted to destroy the general framework of the bill. There is a great deal of difference of opinion with respect to the basis or bases of valuation of public property for rate making and the like. I am a follower of the school just suggested by the Senator from Montana. I believe that the thing that is to be protected by the Constitution of the United States is the cost.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator referred to the word "original," which he desires to insert, as well—that is, the original cost.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will give my reason for that in a moment.

Mr. WALSH. I was going to suggest to the Senator that that might not include expenditures made in addition to the initial cost.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have now suggested why I think the word "physical" should precede and qualify the word "property."

The amendment in its next phase seeks to strike out the words "or acquired." I have been utterly unable to understand the application of those words. If the grantee owns the property at the time of the expiration of the lease or grant and it is valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, I can not see what influence the words "or acquired" could have upon the problem to be solved. Not understanding how these words could affect the situation, I have sought to strike them out, because I assume that whoever proposed them had some purpose in view, and if there is any purpose in view I have reached the conclusion that it must be an unsound purpose. Therefore I have moved to eliminate those words.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator would, no doubt, be quite right about that matter if the bill confined itself to what was acquired from the Government. This particular portion of the bill, however, as I have suggested, proposes to take over everything; and in the meantime the corporation has acquired the right to the use of the water. It may do that simply by the use of the permit from the Government or by the use of some permit from the State, or in various other ways. It has not purchased it, but it has acquired it.

Now, I am not trying to help the Senator or anybody else to perfect this bill. I am opposed to it, as the Senator will very well understand, in whatever form it may take; but I can very well see that the word "acquired" there is proper to be used when you consider all that the Government proposes to take over.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the language of the bill is:

All the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted which is necessary and appurtenant.

That description covers all the property that is so used; and if I insert the word "physical," then, of course, it is quite likely that if it is intended to make the United States pay for rights that have been acquired from the State in the way of the use of water the words "or acquired" would not be material, but the word "physical" ought not to be inserted.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what he thinks the grantee under this bill does acquire under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that he does not acquire anything except the permission of the Government to obstruct in a certain way the flow of a navigable stream.

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely it. The grantee does not acquire any of the things that the Government proposes to take over by virtue of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WORKS. He must acquire them under the laws of the State.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I think the Senator from California is wrong about that, for, having secured this permission, the grantee proceeds to construct a dam. The grantee owns the dam. He proceeds to construct a power house. The grantee owns the power house. He proceeds to construct a transmission line. The grantee owns the transmission line. All these are physical properties.

Mr. WORKS. But, Mr. President, he does not acquire any of those things by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WORKS. He must acquire them under the laws of the State, and they must be regulated afterwards under the laws of the State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor is this language limited to the property that is acquired under this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly not. That is just the reason why I am objecting to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the comment being made by the Senator from Iowa on this matter, because upon further consideration I am satisfied that the Senator from Iowa is right in saying that those words have no appropriate place there. I think, further, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, that the same may be said of the words "and appurtenant," to which the Senator's amendment is not addressed. If it should read—

All the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, and which is necessary or valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation of power—

It would seem to be sensible. But I feel perfectly satisfied that the words "and appurtenant" are quite as improper in that connection as the words "and acquired," to which the Senator from Iowa is now addressing his remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am inclined to think the Senator from Montana is right about the matter he has just mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought perhaps the words "or acquired" had reference to whatever property they had acquired after the passage of the bill and after the lease had been made. They might make a lease based upon what property they had at the time, or whatever they had in operation; or, for instance, if there were a company already formed and at present in operation, they would take a lease upon the property that they had at the time the lease was made; but at the end of the 50 years they might have acquired additional property. Therefore it becomes necessary to provide that the Government, in taking over the property, shall take over not only the property that they had at the time the lease was made, but also the property they had acquired in the meantime.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not say what the author of the bill had in mind in the use of those words; but the view that is taken by the Senator from Utah can hardly be accepted, because the words are—

And upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent, in whole or in part—

And so forth. That means all the property that is owned by the grantee at the time the property is taken over, no matter when it was created or how or from whom it was acquired.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I wish to call the Senator's attention to section 5 of the Ferris power bill, and at a hearing before the Public Lands Committee this morning the same question arose. The bill as reported to the Senate was as follows:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right, upon the expiration of any lease, to take over all the properties which are dependent, in whole or in part, for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, which may have been acquired by any lessee under the provisions of this act.

Mr. Pierce appeared before the committee this morning and stated to the committee that if those words were allowed to remain in the bill it would be absolutely impossible for the Government to take over any property that any company had acquired after the lease was made, and the committee accepted this amendment. I will call the Senator's attention to it. After the word "properties," insert:

Controlled, acquired, or owned by any lessee and used in the development, generation, or transmission of electric current—

So that it would read as follows:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right upon the expiration of any lease to take over all the properties controlled, acquired, or owned by any lessee and used in the development, generation, or transmission of electric current which are dependent in whole or in part for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not capable, of course, of analyzing closely at this moment the language used in the bill to which the Senator refers, but it is manifestly very different from the language of the measure before us in respect of the immediate discussion. However, I am sure that the words "all the property of the grantee" would cover every possible condition relating to its original construction or acquirement from some other person or corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. It would take everything in, I will say to the Senator, that the company has at the time the lease is made; all the property; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see. I can not read this statute in that way. I am not able to comment upon the language in the other bill, but when a section begins—

That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent—and so forth, it is impossible to seriously argue that the United States would not be under obligation to take over all the property then owned or held by the grantee and that was used and necessary for the purposes described in the measure. But there is no use in taking up a great deal of time upon that particular point, for in any view of it the words "or acquired," in their present connection, ought to be eliminated.

I go now to my next suggestion——

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes will he pardon a word there? Both those verbs are qualified by the phrase "in the distribution of water"; that is, "valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water"; but appurtenant in the distribution of water means nothing. Acquired in the distribution of water means nothing. The language is "all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water."

We can understand about property used that is valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, but we can not understand about property that is appurtenant in the distribution of water or that is acquired in the distribution of water. These two verbs can not bear the qualifying phrase which follows.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. It may be that the view of the committee was to use the words "or acquired" in connection with the words "in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power," although I do not think they are so related in the text that such a construction would be necessary; but if that is the construction I am all the more opposed to the insertion of the words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The only objection I see to the clause under consideration is the use of the words "hereunder granted," line 1, page 10. All the other words used are pertinent and do mean something which I will undertake to explain when I come to discuss the matter. I am not going to interrupt the Senator to do it now, but I will at the proper time offer to strike out the words "hereunder granted," in line 1, on page 10; after "which," in the same line, by striking out the word "are" and inserting the word "is"; and striking out the word "or," in line 2, and inserting the word "and."

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood that. I do not regard those changes as at all material to the question I am discussing. I will await, then, the view of the Senator from Tennessee with regard to the meaning and application of the words "or acquired."

I pass now to the amendment which proposes to insert the word "original" before the word "cost," in line 5, and the words "without interest" after the word "cost."

It will be observed that here are two rules laid down for the ascertainment of the value of property of which the grantee may be the owner. So far as the property is valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water or in the generation and transmission and distribution of power, the value of the property is to be ascertained in one way. So far as the property that is peculiar to navigation is concerned, it is not the value of the property, but the cost of the property. I can see a very good reason for that, because the property—the lock or the adjacent structures, whatever they may be—created for the purpose of navigation may be at the end of 50 years absolutely worthless, for if a hope of navigation had at that time been abandoned, property created or a structure built in order to promote or aid navigation would be of no service to any person and might be altogether worthless. Therefore, I agree with the thought of the bill in that respect.

But the word "cost" as it is used in the bill includes not only original cost, but it includes all interest on cost from the time of the construction to the time the Government is asked to pay for the structure.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator mean by original cost to exclude any additions which may be made to these structures?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. The term "original cost" relates to the time when the particular property under consideration was created or constructed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Suppose the dam were extended by the order of the Secretary of War for navigation purposes, say, 10 years after the original construction, would this exclude that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. The words "original cost" have a perfectly well-known meaning. We employed those words in the statute which we passed to provide for the valuation of railroads, and they are being applied by the Interstate Commerce Commission constantly; I am sorry to say not as persistently as I wish they were, but they are being applied. Original cost means the cost of the property when it was created.

Mr. SHIELDS. Exclusive of interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. Exclusive of interest.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator does he include the dam or dams in the words "or other structures" in line 24 of his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; other structures used in navigation. I assume that means constructed for purposes of navigation, and that would not be necessary for the use of the dam as a water-power generator.

Mr. SHIELDS. It does not mean, then, to allow compensation for the cost of the dam?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, the cost of the dam is entirely provided for in the first clause, where we provide that the United States shall pay for "all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power." The Government has agreed to pay for the dam; for the full value of the dam.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that it has agreed to pay for it there. What is the basis or measure of value of the cost price at the time?

Mr. CUMMINS. The basis of it is a very disputed proposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. I mean under the Senator's amendment. What does it mean?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not change that at all. I simply confine it to the physical property, and it is, I assume, to be valued according to the rules of the law applicable to such controversies. But when we come to the part of the property that is constructed solely for navigation, the committee has provided a different rule; and, as I said a moment ago, I think very properly a different rule, assuming that the first rule was right, of which I have grave doubt. But the grantee who constructed a lock or some other appurtenant of the dam that was to be used only in navigation, and did so at the command of the Secretary of War, ought to have the original cost of doing it, and ought not to have one penny more, and ought not to have any interest upon that cost. Why? Because the bill specifically provides that in the ascertainment of the rates to be charged for the service rendered the cost of the lock and such other incidental property as may be necessary for the lock shall be considered as a part of the value upon which the rates are to be based. Therefore——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Therefore it may be assumed that during the course of 50 years the grantee will have recovered from the public interest upon the cost of the purely navigation structure, and when we at the end of 50 years are required to take it over and pay the original cost with interest, we are paying it twice. There is no escape from that conclusion, I think. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I fully agree with the Senator as to that; but I wish to inquire of him whether he desires to have it understood that under the language of the bill, which gives to the grantee only the cost of the locks, it means that he shall have the cost with interest?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. Is that the construction the Senator would give it if he were a judge on a bench?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the construction I would give to it; at least, that is the construction that I fear a court would give to it; and if it has the other interpretation, no possible harm can be wrought by making it specific and beyond any controversy.

I now come to the next proposal. I strike out the words "all other capital expenditures." It may be observed that these words are not qualified at all. They are not qualified by the purpose of the capital expenditure, and no matter what the amount of capital that is not embraced within the two general divisions to which I have already referred. If they have been acquired by the requirement of the United States, the United States must pay.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is that qualification "required by the United States"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have just stated it.

Mr. SHIELDS. "Required by the United States." I ask the Senator is not that a qualification?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said just as rapidly as I could precisely what the bill provided, and, of course, what the Senator must have understood me to say or to mean was that they were not qualified in the way the previous description of property or capital had been qualified.

I substitute for those words a rule or provision which I think would protect the United States, and I know it would protect the grantee. The words are:

Of the lock or locks or other structures used in navigation and required by the United States.

I am not willing to give to the Secretary of War the authority to require the grantee to make a capital expenditure unless it is connected with the improvement of or is in aid of navigation. If the Secretary of War requires a building or structure which he says is to be used in aid of navigation, then if the Government takes over the property it must pay for it, but otherwise not.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Probably we might hurry this along by interrogating the Senator about his view of these things as we go along. On page 8—

Such rules and regulations—

To be supplied by the Secretary of War—

may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and such other lights and signals and such fishways as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce—

And so forth.

What would the Senator say as to expenditures under that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not that in mind at the time I prepared the amendment. I am trying to treat this singly. I had reached the conclusion that it would be a great deal safer to require the Government to pay only for the lock or locks or other structures used in navigation than to give the broad and somewhat indefinite privilege to the grantee to require payment of all capital expenditures that might be required by the United States. This is really a restriction upon the Secretary of War, and I think it is one that is sound. I, of course, add to that the words "and valuable and serviceable for no other purpose."

My next amendment is to strike out that part of the bill which provides that the Government at the end of the period shall take over and assume "all contracts entered into by the grantee which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate."

I look upon that provision as an extremely dangerous one and one not necessary for the protection of the grantee, nor is it necessary to induce capital to invest in an enterprise. We are conferring upon an individual or a corporation the right to—I hope the Senator from California is not here, because if he is he will at once object to this assumption—to build a dam in a navigable stream and to continue the use of the water therein, in so far as he may get the right from the State for a period of 50 years. That is a long period, not too long, but the grantee, seeing the approach of the end of the period, ought not to enter into contracts that would extend themselves beyond the termination of the privilege which had been granted to him. There is no difficulty about that.

I have heard it suggested here several times that there ought to be the power to enter into long contracts, and I agree to that; but there is no necessity for giving the grantee the right to enter into a contract extending beyond a period of 50 years. No human being can tell what kind of contracts will be made, even though they are to be made under the authority of the State commission. If they are of that character, or even though they are here required to be reasonable and to be made in good faith, if they are not under the supervision of some public utility, what possible harm can come to the public or to any grantee, if the grantee so arranges his affairs that at the end of the period in which he has a right to use the stream the contract shall come to an end? It is not good public policy, in any event, to make long contracts for a service of this character. I need but suggest my idea in order to have it fully understood, and therefore I will not continue the argument upon it.

Now, may I say one other thing, for I have passed over the various elements in the amendments which I have proposed? I realize, as does every Senator who is interested in this bill, that I must address my argument to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. Without the least offense—I could not possibly give offense to Senators with the feeling I have toward them—the history of the bill up to the present moment convinces any man that no amendment can be or will be adopted that does not recommend itself to the Senator from Tennessee, who is in charge of the bill. I am not complaining about that condition. It is simply a high and most complimentary testimonial of the confidence which Senators repose in the committee and in its distinguished chairman.

The Senator from Tennessee has kindly sat near me as I have been discussing the amendment which I have offered. I know that he desires justice in the matter; he does not want the United States to pay more than the value of the property as determined by the modern, intelligent, economic rules which are applied to such subjects, and I ask him not to answer me at this moment, but in his reply to me, if he shall honor me with one, to tell the Senate what there is in my amendment that will deprive the grantee of one single penny to which he will be fairly and justly entitled when his privilege to occupy the stream ends.

Mr. President, I now intend to present—for I will do it while I am on my feet—an amendment which is closely connected with the one I have already offered; indeed it is a part of it, and it is equally applicable to the section, no matter whether the present pending amendment is adopted or rejected. It is a proviso that I want to add to section 6, no matter in what form section 6 shall be finally disposed of.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Iowa has been very kind in his remarks about the committee and the confidence reposed in it. In his reference to the Senator from Tennessee I started to interrupt him and to suggest that he meant the committee, for I am simply representing the committee.

What I rose to ask the Senator from Iowa, however, was whether I understood him, as I was coming into the Chamber—for I was called out for a few moments during his address—as stating that under this bill the company making an improvement would at the expiration of the time have practically already amortized or received its capital investment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am about to discuss that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not hear all of the remarks of the Senator, and I evidently was mistaken. I am glad the Senator is going to discuss the amendment in the same connection. I think they are closely related.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if there was no amortization during the period, then either the section as reported by the committee or the section as I have hoped to amend it would determine the value of the property and the amount that the United States must pay. I send to the desk an amendment, which I propose to offer immediately upon the disposition of the amendment now under consideration, for information only, for I realize that I have no right to offer it at this time, and because I do not want the two amendments to be voted on at the same time. I ask, however, that the amendment may be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 6, page 10, line 23, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if in the operation of the property for which, under the foregoing provision, the United States is required to pay it shall appear that it has earned during the period of use by the grantee, or his assignee or successor, a surplus over and above cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation of that part of the property valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, taxes and other fixed charges, including bonded indebtedness and such reasonable return upon the remainder of the capital invested, not including investment from earnings, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, then the amount of such surplus shall be deducted from the aggregate of the fair value and original cost as above ascertained, and the United States shall be required to pay only the balance so resulting: Provided further, That in order to facilitate the ascertainment of the amount of such surplus to be so deducted the Secretary of War is authorized to require from the grantee, his assignee or successor, such annual reports as will set forth the information material to such inquiry and ascertainment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is quite probable that I will desire to make some observations upon this amendment at the time I offer it, but I feel that, in justice to the Senator from Tennessee, I ought to disclose my reasons for preparing and offering it, inasmuch as it is obvious that section 6 as it is, or as it may be amended, and the proviso which has just been read are indissolubly connected with each other.

Beginning with the proposition that it is fair and just for the Government to take over the property of the grantee at the end of the period and to pay its value, it is obvious that the reason why the Government ought to do that is to make the grantee whole with respect to the property which is to be created or acquired in pursuance of the privileges granted by the bill. If it were not for that reason, there would be no foundation whatever for an agreement on the part of the United States to indemnify the grantee for his expenditures. The proviso just read means this: That if during the period of the privilege the grantee has earned a sum of money that will, in the first place, defray all the costs of operation; in the second place, defray all the costs of maintenance; and, in the third place, pay all the fixed charges, including bonded indebtedness, taxes, and all other impositions of that character, and pay to the remainder of the capital, not accumulated from earnings, a fair and reasonable reward under all the circumstances, and has still a sum of money arising from, if not unlawful, at least, excessive charges for the service rendered, then the amount so accumulated, whether in hand or whether expended, shall be used to reduce the value of the property as found in the preceding part of the section.

This is right, because if the United States pays to the grantee the full value of the property as ascertained, and if the people have paid to the same grantee the full value of the property in charges which are not unlawful, possibly, but so excessive that they have resulted in an accumulation of this character, then it is little less than robbery—I do not know of any terms that are too emphatic to be applied to it—it is utterly indefensible to make the people of the United States pay again.

This is not to invoke any new or startling doctrine. It is to apply the most modern, the best-sustained rules of industrial economy. I will give an instance. Suppose the grantee has entered into possession of the river and has continued to operate the plant created for the generation of power for a period of 50 years and has charged those to whom he has supplied power a rate which during the 50 years has not only paid all the cost of operation, all the cost of maintenance, all the fixed charges, all the interest upon the bonded debt, but, in addition, 12 per cent, as an illustration, upon the remainder of the capital invested, and, having paid all these things, still has left a sum arising from the earnings of the plant more than the amount originally invested in the plant. Is it fair, can it be insisted upon that under those circumstances the Government, in taking over the property, should not only pay the value of the property, computed under whatever rules are finally adopted, but should leave the grantee in the possession of a sum, accumulated through charges that are morally excessive, if not legally excessive, and thus not only replace the capital once, but replace it twice?

It will be remarked, I trust, by the Senator from Tennessee that the proviso does not apply except to the extent that such excessive charges accumulate a surplus of that character. To me the proposal is so buttressed by fundamental principles of justice and fair dealing that it ought not to require any argument whatever. If we are trying, as I know we are, to develop at once the water power of the country and protect the people of the country from unreasonable and undue exaction, what is the objection to the suggestion that I have made in the amendment read for information? If it does not become a part of the bill, I venture to say that many of those who become the recipients of these privileges will not only recoup all their capital investments from the earnings of the property, but will in the end recoup them again from the Treasury of the United States.

So far as I am concerned, as much as I desire to see some plan devised that will stimulate the development of our water powers, it seems to me that I could never give my assent to a bill that might lead—and I think in many instances would lead—to double payment for capital.

I can instance half a dozen corporations. I do not intend to do it, because it would be invidious. I have no right to exploit their affairs in this incidental way; but I have on my tongue's end now half a dozen corporations that in the period of less than 20 years have not only paid all the expenses of maintenance and operation, fixed charges, and the like, and met all the demands of dividends for capital, but which have accumulated during that short period a surplus more than twice the value of the property with which the business was originally begun.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator mind telling us what return, in his opinion, at the present time, would be adequate upon investments of this character?

Mr. CUMMINS. As sorry as I am to do it, I must give that discretion to a single man. I do not think that is wise, but I can not stand here to batter down the whole framework of the law. I am very reluctant to give to any one man the decision in a matter so important.

Now, what is a reasonable return upon capital, I think, upon reflection, might well be stipulated in the permit itself over at least a reasonable period; but if that is not to be done, then the Secretary of War must look at all the circumstances—the hazard of the venture, the community to be served, the purpose for which the water is to be used—and then say what, under all those conditions, is a reasonable return.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to follow that with another question. Is it the view of the Senator that the same man, looking at the situation from the present standpoint of the investor, would reach exactly the same conclusion as if he projected himself 50 years forward and then looked over the situation?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very sure he would not.

Mr. WALSH. No. Is it not altogether likely that if he considered the matter now he would offer a very much higher return than he would feel he would like to give in case he were figuring on a basis of 50 years hence?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana will observe that I have not required the Secretary of War to fix the reward or the percentage of return at the time the permit is granted.

Mr. WALSH. That was the way I understood the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the final settlement came, at the end of 50 years, I would expect whoever might be the Secretary of War to determine the percentage of the reward according to the conditions as they existed during the period of years.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; so I understood the Senator's amendment—that he would leave it to the Secretary who exists 50 years from now. But the investor would have to know now, when he puts in his money. Would it not be more appropriate, therefore, to leave it to the present Secretary to say how much the return should be?

Mr. CUMMINS. The difficulty about leaving it to a present Secretary, although it has many things to be said in its favor, is that it is very hard to project oneself over the varying conditions of 50 years and say what reward would be reasonable 50 years hence, although I would not object to that modification of my amendment. I see a great many things to be said for it, and there are some things to be said against it. But, at any rate, we ought to protect ourselves in some fashion against the contingency that I have endeavored to set out.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator expressed great regret at leaving this adjustment of rates, or fair return upon the investment—which is the same thing—to one man, the Secretary of War. I agree with him that it ought not to be left to one man, the Secretary of War, but that it ought to be left to the public-service commissions of the States, composed generally of several men, to fix right at the time the income is received by the corporation, or the Interstate Commerce Commission, in case it goes into interstate commerce. Now, the Senator proposes a post-mortem examination, after the lapse of 50 years of the business of this corporation and after it has been dissolved by the expiration of its permit and is forced to sell its property and to cease business. What would he do with the rights of the stockholders who had sold their stock in the corporation just 10 years before the permit had expired? Would he make them lose their interest in the property because 20 years prior to that some stockholders had received a return that was excessive?

There are several questions of that kind which I should like to ask the Senator, but the time at which it was contemplated that we would take a recess has about arrived. I think the Senator's amendment is impracticable. I do not think the Secretary of War ought to be allowed to hold this post-mortem upon this corporation, or that he can constitutionally be vested with the power to review the action of the State public-service commissions in adjusting rates, or the Interstate Commerce Commission where they have done so; and certainly I know of no case in which a review of quasi judicial bodies has been had after all the witnesses are dead, after a lapse of 40 or 50 years.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no proposal here to review the acts of any of these utility commissions, whether Federal or State. If the few companies that secure grants under this bill and that are under regulation of that sort adopt the regulation and accumulate no surplus, then the proviso which I have suggested can do them no possible harm. But the very many grantees—I am simply conjecturing now—who will receive the permission and who are not under any effective regulation will necessarily be subjected to a review at the end of the period; but the review can do them no possible harm. It simply reduces the amount to be paid by the Government in cases where it is doubtful whether the Government should pay anything anyhow.

I realize that the proposal is not without difficulty; but we must not fall into the habit of shrinking from difficulties when we are trying to protect the public and overcoming them so easily when we are trying to grant privileges. This bill is full of difficulty. It is full of power to be exercised by a single person. I wish it were otherwise, but I do not see any way in which to avoid that plan. But I should like to give that same person the privilege of exercising a discretion, which I know he might abuse, but which I hope he would exercise wisely, to protect the public as well as to do full justice to the individual grantee or enterprise.

There is no more difficulty in doing what I have proposed on the part of the Secretary of War than there is in the provision that these rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Without pausing to debate it, I venture to say that the provision in this bill which refers certain rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission is absolutely unworkable and never can result in any substantial good to the public. That is not the fault of the Senator from Tennessee, for I do not believe it can be done. When he says that these rates are to be fixed in the same way that railroad rates are fixed, he presents an impossible proposition. Railroads fix their rates and publish their schedules and then file their schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then anyone who desires to challenge a rate appears before the commission and makes complaint against it. It is not possible for every grantee under this bill to conform to the rules which are imposed upon the railroads of the country and which are necessary in order to reach a regulation of railroad rates. But if the Senator from Tennessee desires to have a recess taken at this time, I will defer until to-morrow what I have still to say.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of Walter S. Meader and 66 other citizens of Gonic; of Hallowe'en Grange, No. 317, Patrons of Husbandry, of Penacook, and of Bear Hill Grange, No. 39, Patrons of Husbandry, of Henniker, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Dr. C. P. Bancroft, of Concord; of Local Union No. 82, Journeymen Barbers' International Union of America, of Concord, and of the State Federation of Labor, all in the State of New Hampshire; of Local Branch, International Seamen's Union of America, of Chicago, Ill.; and of Local Branch, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of Frank H. Rauser, of Claremont, N. H., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of H. H. Sanderson, proprietor of the Gazette-Times Press, of Lancaster, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to permit publishers to exchange advertising space for transportation, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Turn Verein of Manchester, N. H., praying for a revision of the naturalization laws, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Turn Verein of Manchester, N. H., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Turn Verein of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Winfield Scott Schley Camp, No. 4, United Spanish War Veterans, of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Suzanne Heber, of New York, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of H. H. Eddy Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Denver, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a privately owned and Government-subsidized merchant marine, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PHELAN presented petitions of Local Union No. 30, Waiters' Union; of Local Union No. 151, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; of Local Union No. 616, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America; of Local Union No. 22, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners; of Local Union No. 148, Journeymen Barbers; and of the Labor Council, all of San Francisco, in the State of California, praying for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of the San Francisco County Medical Society, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for an increase in the Dental Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of E. H. Liscum Camp, No. 7, United Spanish War Veterans, of Oakland, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Naval Camp, No. 1, United Spanish War Veterans, of Philadelphia, Pa., and a petition of Major William McKinley Camp, No. 10, United Spanish War Veterans, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to the widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 2728, United Mine Workers of America, of Burgettstown, Pa., and a petition of Local Branch No. 36, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Marienville, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 163, International Union of the United Brewery Workmen, of Freeland, Pa., and a memorial of Local Union No. 163, International Union of the United Brewery Workmen, of Hazleton, Pa., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Johnstown, Pa., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against American citizens taking passage on armed merchant vessels, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Pattern Makers' Union of Minneapolis and St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of the Young Men's Christian Association of the Colgate University, Prohibition League of Hamilton, and of sundry citizens of Blodgett Mills, Ithaca, West Frankfort, Victor, Medina, Endicott, Bangall, Tillson, and Schenectady, all in the State of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLLIS. I present the petition of ex-Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

Your petitioners, citizens of the United States, respectfully represent that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, consisting of more than 300,000 souls, have been held and are now being held in legal bondage under a despotic form of government, in which they have had no representation whatever, which has thus oppressed and despoiled them of life, liberty, and property continuously for more than 30 years last past, and that it is alleged and claimed that the said despotism is so set up and exercised over the inhabitants of the District of Columbia by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. The permanent continuance of such a state of things is intolerable and impossible in a free country.

Your petitioners believe that the people of the District of Columbia are entitled to their full share in the sovereignty by which they are governed and to equality of civil and political rights with other citizens of the United States and of the several States, including voting representation in both Houses of Congress, which has over them the combined powers of the National and State Governments over other American citizens.

One drop of poison at the heart kills more surely than a shower shed on the surface of the body.

It is not well for the robust freedom which dwells on the hills and mountain ranges and in the valleys and plains of the country, which is our only real hope as a nation, to behold even a splendid slavery in its Capital City and its people growing fat and magnificent and contented in their bonds, though made of hemp and iron and gold, so mingled that at a little distance and to the popular eye the glisten of the latter conceals the other two.

Some who claim this to be the best form of government on earth are themselves the government which they thus naturally approve; others are apprehensive that any change will be harmful to dominant interests and to the forces and conditions which keep them so; others still are honest disbelievers in free institutions and all government republican in form or their unrepublican environment has developed native-born foreigners under the shadow of the Capitol. But the great mass of human beings in the District of Columbia want a radical change for themselves, if possible, but chiefly for their children and the generations to come.

The population of the District of Columbia has increased fivefold during the last 50 years, and with the impetus which would come from participation in the higher franchise and general sovereignty of the country (not merely the local, subordinate, municipal franchise which Congress may now confer) before the close of the twentieth century more than 2,000,000 people will dwell within her limits.

The ordinance of 1787 and the cession of territory by Georgia in both cases required the division of the territory and its admission into the Union as States when the subdivision had a population of only 60,000 free inhabitants.

(2) Your petitioners also allege, as a matter of history, that in time of peace great danger has arisen to the existence of the Government of the United States by reason of deficient provisions in the Constitution for the transmission of the executive power, in that under the operation of those now existing an election of President became impossible and a deadlock in the Government and disturbance of public order, if not civil war, was only avoided by resort to a certain unconstitutional makeshift of device entered into by agreement of parties, known as an Electoral Commission, the practical working of which was not such as to make like agreements probable hereafter.

(3) They further respectfully allege that in their belief the failure of the Constitution to provide for the temporary exercise of the executive power and for a new election whenever for any cause no President shall have been inaugurated at the end of the regular term of the President is a source of danger calling for immediate remedy.

Wherefore your petitioners pray the Congress to inquire, and if these things are found to be so, to formulate and submit to the legislatures of the States a joint resolution or resolutions for amendments to the Constitution substantially as follows, or in some better form which the wisdom of the Congress may prescribe:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The District of Columbia shall be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States by one Senator and by one or more Representatives, according to the rule of apportionment established by the Constitution, and to as many electors for President and Vice President as it has Members of the Congress, who shall have the same qualifications and powers as other like officers, and shall be chosen, and all vacancies filled, by election of the people.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall prescribe and regulate the qualifications of voters in the District of Columbia in any manner consistent with government republican in form.

"SEC. 3. When the choice of President shall devolve upon the House of Representatives, the Members of the House chosen from the District of Columbia shall vote and be counted as a State, but in no case shall the vote of a Member chosen to either House of Congress from said District be cast or counted when a choice of President or of Vice President will thereby be prevented; and in case there is a tie in the vote for President in the delegation from the District of Columbia in the choice of President by the House of Representatives voting by States, and there is no choice without the vote of the delegation from the District, the Senator from the District shall vote as a member of the delegation, to the end that a President may be chosen.

"In whatever manner the President and Vice President may be chosen, the vote of the District of Columbia shall not be cast and counted if a choice will thereby be prevented.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may provide for the holding of a new election by the people of the United States forthwith whenever, for any cause, a President shall not be chosen or inaugurated before the expiration of the existing term of the President and for the temporary exercise of the Executive power (during a period not exceeding 90 days) until a President is inaugurated whose term of office shall end four years from the expiration of the preceding full term.

"SEC. 5. The Congress shall enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 4737) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Weaver (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 4738) granting an increase of pension to Niles H. Arnold (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4739) granting an increase of pension to Mary Bracey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 4740) granting an increase of pension to Leafy J. Leavitt; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4741) granting an increase of pension to Peter F. Weasel; and

A bill (S. 4742) granting an increase of pension to Jesse W. Casteel (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 4743) granting an increase of pension to William A. Collins (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 4744) granting an increase of pension to Nettie Lamprey (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4745) granting an increase of pension to Minnie L. Gould (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

ADJUDICATION OF CLAIMS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m., Wednesday, March 1, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 2, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Be graciously near to us, O God our heavenly Father, as we thus approach Thee in prayer; a fitting preparation for the duties of the hour. Illumine our minds, quicken every noble impulse, every holy aspiration, that our motives may be guided by the highest conception of right, truth, and justice, now and ever more, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 8246. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. LLOYD, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in general debate in opposition to the bill if there is no one on the committee who desires recognition in that status.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anybody on the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time I have consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I will first yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been very liberal in granting time to me. I do not think, however, that I shall take but a few minutes, and the time I do not occupy I will yield back to the gentleman.

The Committee on Revision of the Laws has reported a bill—H. R. 8033—upon the same subject matter as this bill, and being a member of that committee I have become somewhat familiar with the legal propositions involved. I am kindly disposed toward these claimants. If any of them are entitled to recover any of this money, they ought to have an opportunity to do so, and ought to have had it long ago. Under this abandoned and captured property act the net proceeds from the sale of property that was taken went into the Treasury of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States held that these moneys became a trust fund held by the Government for the benefit of the rightful owners. A very large amount of the money thus received has been paid to different claimants.

There are just two points I wish to make. First, that under the abandoned and captured property act as it has been construed by the court since the general amnesty proclamation of December 25, 1868, a claimant to recover a portion of this money has to do only two things—first, to prove that he was the owner of the property at the time it was taken by the Government and, second, that the net proceeds thereof went into the Treasury of the United States. In other words, while the abandoned-and-captured-property act, in addition to these two things, requires the claimant to prove that he did not give any aid or comfort to the rebellion since the general amnesty proclamation referred to, the claimant has not been required either to assert loyalty in his petition or to prove loyalty on the trial of his claim. That much is said by the committee in its report upon this bill; and, as far as the report covers that subject, I concur in the report of the committee.

Under section 162 of the Judicial Code of the United States the Court of Claims has jurisdiction in these cases. All that a claimant under existing law has to do is to present a petition to the Court of Claims, go there and prove that he owned the property at the time it was taken, and that the net proceeds went into the Treasury of the United States and he can recover.

In order that there might be no question about that, after I had read the opinions of the court, very exhaustive, analytical, and logical, in the Lincoln case, and after I had examined the decisions of the court cited in those opinions, I went to see the able and distinguished counsel who conducted the cases on behalf of the Government. I stated to him that, although he had raised this question of loyalty in a preliminary motion to dismiss the petition in the Lincoln case, I could not see where he had the slightest ground upon which to base such a contention. He said he agreed with me. So I asked him to send me a written communication, that I might use it in the House so that the Members might know what his position is, which communication as to such matter appears in the statement of facts and law hereinafter referred to and set forth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that I may not take up the time of the House I will on this proposition ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein a statement of facts and law applicable to this question, or so much as I may deem applicable thereto, for the benefit of those who are interested and to make it available to the Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by the insertion of the matter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The act of March 12, 1863, mentioned in the pending bill, is known as the abandoned and captured property act. This act (sec. 3) provided that special agents of the Federal Government should cause a book or books of account to be kept, showing from whom property was received, etc., and any person claiming to have been the owners of any such abandoned or captured property could, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims. The official date of the ending of the Rebellion was August 20, 1866. Thus the limitation within which such a claim could be presented to the Court of Claims terminated on August 20, 1868.

Under this act a claimant, to succeed, must establish to the satisfaction of the court three things:

1. His ownership of the property seized.
2. His right to the proceeds thereof.
3. That he never gave aid or comfort to the rebellion.

Lincoln v. United States (50 Ct. Cls. Repts., 70).

The general amnesty proclamation was issued on December 25, 1868, granting—

"Unconditionally, and without reservation, to all and to every person who, directly or indirectly, participated in the late insurrection or rebellion a full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States or of adhering to their enemies during the late Civil War, with restoration of all rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution and laws which have been made in pursuance thereof."

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that under the broad terms of this proclamation the pardons became retroactive, reaching back because of the obliteration of the offense. Consequently, since December 25, 1868, a claimant under the abandoned and captured property act has not been required to prove that he never gave aid or comfort to the rebellion.

At December term, 1871, in the case of United States v. Klein (13 Wall., 128), the court held, the Chief Justice delivering the opinion, that the captured and abandoned property act did not confiscate or in any case absolutely divest the property of the original owner, even though disloyal, and that by the seizure the Government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled to the net proceeds therefrom or whom it should thereafterwards recognize as entitled, and that persons who had faithfully accepted the provisions offered by the proclamation of pardon of December 8, 1863, became entitled to the proceeds of their property thus paid into the Treasury on application within two years from the close of the war.

This was followed by Armstrong v. United States (13 Wall., 154) and Pargoud v. United States (13 Wall., 156).

In Carlisle v. United States (16 Wall., 147), December term, 1872, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, after referring to the foregoing cases, observed:

"After these repeated adjudications it must be regarded as settled in this court that the pardon of the President, whether granted by special letters or by general proclamation, relieves claimants of the proceeds of captured and abandoned property from the consequences of participation in the Rebellion and from the necessity of establishing their loyalty in order to prosecute their claims. This result follows whether we regard the pardon as effacing the offense, blotting it out, in the language of the cases, as though it had never existed, or regard persons pardoned as necessarily excepted from the general language of the act which requires claimants to make proof of their adhesion during the Rebellion to the United States. It is not to be supposed that Congress intended by the general language of the act to encroach upon any of the prerogatives of the President, and especially that benign prerogative of mercy which lies in the pardoning power. It is more reasonable to conclude that claimants, restored to their rights of property by the pardon of the President, were not in contemplation of Congress in passing the act and were not intended to be embraced by the requirement in question. All general terms in statutes should be limited in their application so as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or any unconstitutional operation, if that be possible."

The act of March 3, 1911, among other things, conferred upon the Court of Claims (sec. 162) jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the said act of Congress approved March 12, 1863. The test case of Lincoln v. the United States, under the act of March 3, 1911, came up in the Court of Claims. Under date of January 17, 1916, Judge Norris, the able and distinguished counsel who conducted this case on behalf of the United States, upon my request sent me a written communication in relation thereto, in which he states this:

"Claim for the proceeds of 77 bales of cotton was brought under section 162 of the Judicial Code. The Government moved the court to dismiss the petition, for the reason that it failed to set forth the loyalty of claimant or his decedent, as required by sections 159 and 162 of the Judicial Code. The motion was overruled by the Court of Claims on the 9th day of February, 1914, and the case was subsequently tried on its merits and decided in favor of the Government on the 11th day of January, 1915, the court holding that the cotton had been sold to the Confederacy in 1868; that Confederate bonds had been received in payment thereof; and that claimant's decedent, Joseph A. Harvey, executed a bill of sale to said Government, with an agreement to care for the cotton on his plantation and deliver the same at points designated in the bill of sale on the order of the Confederate secretary of the treasury. The court also found that claimant had failed to show that the proceeds of the sale of the 77 bales of cotton had ever been placed in the Treasury of the United States, and that either of said facts—the sale to the Confederate Government or failure to trace the proceeds of the cotton to the Treasury—precluded a recovery by claimant, and dismissed the petition."

The court in overruling the said motion to dismiss the petition upon the ground that it failed to set forth the loyalty of claimant or his decedent handed down an able and exhaustive opinion upon the law applicable thereto. This opinion was unanimous and will be found in 49 Court of Claims Reports, 300.

The court in deciding the case upon its merits held—

1. That it had jurisdiction.
2. Where the facts show that the plaintiff sold his cotton to the "Confederate States of America," he can not recover therefor.
3. Where the plaintiff can not trace the proceeds of the sale of cotton taken from him into the United States Treasury, he can not recover therefor.

Upon the decision of this case the Court of Claims handed down an able and exhaustive opinion upon the law applicable thereto. This opinion will be found in 50 Court of Claims Reports, 70.

After reading carefully these two exhaustive opinions of the court, and examining the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States cited and referred to therein, I again saw Judge Norris and stated to him that in my judgment I could not see the slightest ground for the contention that a claimant under section 162 of the Judicial Code was required to assert loyalty in his petition or to prove loyalty upon the trial of his claim. He stated that he quite agreed with me, and upon my request sent me, under date of February 11, 1916, a further written communication in reference thereto in which he states:

"I find that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of May 18, 1872, paid the three following South Carolina cotton claims, as found on page 50, Senate Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress:

"B. F. Williamson, $33,049.15; S. H. Wilds, $10,401.30; Hannah Bethea, $2,436.

"But one judgment has been recovered in the Court of Claims under the act taking effect January 1, 1912, that of Evan J. Lide for $2,083.86. The claimant in the Lide case made the necessary proof under section 162 of the Judicial Code. I did not raise the question of loyalty, not thinking it just to claimant to hold up the payment of his small claim for which he had waited so long, by a defense in which I had no confidence.

"I am well satisfied that the Court of Claims was right in overruling the Government's motion to dismiss the petition in the Lincoln case for nonaverment of loyalty, and their decision would be sustained by the Supreme Court. The Government was fully justified in making the motion, and I felt at the time that it should be sustained, but a subsequent study of these cases and a consideration of the conditions prevailing in 1865 has led me to an opposite conclusion. There is no doubt the framers of section 162 of the Judicial Code intended to include all individuals whose property had been taken after the close of hostilities, irrespective of their political sentiments. This is manifest from Executive action taken at the time. After the surrender of Gens. Lee and Johnston, Treasury agents were authorized by the Secretary to collect cotton on the plantations of owners who had sold it to the Confederate Government, received Confederate bonds in payment, and given bills of sale thereof. They were instructed to take nothing but cotton that had been sold to the Confederacy, as aforesaid, and that which had been taken by the military, previous to the close of hostilities, over the civil authorities. They were not empowered to take the property of individual owners.

"Chief Justice Chase, in the case of McDonald v. Callicott, wherein McDonald brought action against the Treasury agent for an unwarranted seizure of his cotton, instructed the jury that the agent was not authorized to seize the cotton of an individual, and if he did so, realizing his lack of authority, he was guilty and the jury should so find him; but if he acted honestly under a mistaken impression of his duty, then in such case he could not be held liable. Under these instructions the jury found him guilty and returned a verdict of $9,000 in favor of claimant. The question of loyalty was not taken into consideration by the Secretary of the Treasury in his investigation of claims under the act of May —, 1872."

The act of May 18, 1872, was a deficiency act, but section 5 thereof (p. 134) provides—

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the lawful owners, or their legal representatives, of all cotton seized after the 30th day of June, 1865, by the agents of the Government unlawfully and in violation of their instructions, the net proceeds, without interest, of the sales of said cotton actually paid into the Treasury of the United States; * * * and provided further, That the foregoing provisions shall not apply to any claim now pending before the Court of Claims, nor to any claim not filed in the Treasury Department within six months after the passage of this act; * * *."

Department Circular No. 4 of the Treasury Department, issued under date of January 9, 1900, and signed by H. A. Taylor, Assistant Secretary, among other things, states:

"By the terms of section 3 of the act approved March 12, 1863 * * *, it was provided that 'any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims.' It was decided officially and afterward judicially that the rebellion closed August 20, 1866, so that the parties had until August 20, 1868, to file their claims in the Court of Claims. Under this act a large number of claims for cotton were filed in that court, and judgments rendered. It appears from the report of the Register of the Treasury, February 4, 1888, that the judgments paid amounted to $9,864,300.75. Since that date there have been paid on judgments rendered by the court and under private acts of Congress $520,700.18.

"Again, under section 5, act of May 18, 1872, * * * the Secretary of the Treasury returned to the owners of cotton seized unlawfully after June 30, 1865, the sum of $195,896.21. * * *"

Thus, it conclusively appears that from the date of the general amnesty proclamation, December 25, 1868, down to the enactment of the act of March 3, 1911, containing section 162 of the Judicial Code, the contention that a claimant under the abandoned and captured property act, of March 12, 1863, must assert in his petition filed in the Court of Claims loyalty, and upon the trial of his claim prove loyalty, is absolutely untenable.

To any person carefully examining the exhaustive opinions of the Court of Claims, hereinbefore mentioned in the Lincoln case, and the act of March 3, 1911, it will conclusively appear that the contention that a claimant under said section 162 of the Judicial Code must assert in his petition filed in the Court of Claims loyalty, and upon the trial thereof prove loyalty, is absolutely untenable.

The act of March 3, 1911, is an act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary (and comprises 301 sections), and is the Judicial Code of the United States.

Section 159 thereof, and mentioned in the report of the committee upon the pending bill, is a reenactment, which was originally enacted March 3, 1863, and similar to section 1072 of the Revised Statutes. Also, sections 160 and 161 of the Judicial Code are substantially reenactments and very similar to sections 1073 and 1074 of the Revised Statutes. (Judicial Code, p. 93.)

Section 162, however, is new legislation, and was read into the Judicial Code under the said act of March 3, 1911. It is clear, as set forth in great length in the said opinions of the Court of Claims, that sections 159, 160, and 161 can have no new meaning and receive no new construction because they were reenacted in the codification, revision, and amending of the laws relating to the judiciary. If they were to be given a new meaning and a new construction, the conclusion would necessarily follow that section 162 is meaningless and of no force or effect.

It is to be presumed that this question was carefully considered by Congress in the enactment of the act of March 3, 1911, and the judgment exercised then has been abundantly justified by the decisions of the court. That Congress in the act of March 3, 1911, took no chances in the premises is clearly and conclusively shown by section 294 of the act of March 3, 1911, which provides "The provisions of this act, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes, shall be construed as continuations thereof and not as new enactments, and there shall be no imputation of a change of intent by reason of a change of words in such statute unless such change of intent shall be clearly manifest."

Under the act of May 18, 1872, without any consideration whatever of the question of loyalty, the Secretary of the Treasury returned to the owners of cotton seized unlawfully after June 30, 1865, the sum of $195,896.21; and in 1915 without the raising or consideration of any question of loyalty judgment was entered in the Court of Claims in favor of Evan J. Lide for $2,083.86, which, I am informed, will be duly paid.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to weary the House further on that subject. The second point I desire to make is that, in my judgment, this is a dangerous bill for the claimants. It purports to be a bill to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863, which is the abandoned and captured property act, and in the body of the bill it states that the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, which conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine claims arising, and so forth, shall be revived.

It says in this bill that the claimant may prefer his claim to the proceeds to the Court of Claims, and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, and so forth. Now, you have got under section 162 of the Judicial Code of the United States all that they want except in two instances.

That section says "for all property taken after June 1, 1865." I think that date of June 1 was taken arbitrarily from the act of May 18, 1872, which gave the claimants six months in which to file their claims, because it does appear from Senate Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, that some cotton was taken in the month of May, 1865, as will be found on page 48 of that document, aggregating about 250 bales. I am informed that there is other additional cotton where it will require proof for the court to determine whether it was taken in the early days of June or in the latter days of May, 1865. So to take care of that situation all you need to do would be to amend section 162 of the code by striking out the word "June" and inserting the word "May." The pending bill also says:

And jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said Court of Claims to adjudicate the claims that were filed under the provisions of said act, and the petitions dismissed by said court.

I do not know to what extent petitions were dismissed by the court in the sixties under said act, but that question could be taken care of by an amendment to section 162 of the Judicial Code. The report of the committee states, on page 6:

It was a matter of doubt among the members of the legal fraternity as to what effect would be given by the Supreme Court to the proclamations. In 1869 the Supreme Court decided that the necessity of proving loyalty in order to recover the proceeds of captured and abandoned property had been removed by the proclamations of pardon and amnesty.

This decision came a year after the limitation had run; too late to benefit that class of claimants. The limitation had expired and the bar was complete.

These claimants, who failed to present their claims because of a mistake of law on a question about which the best legal talent of the country disagreed, can not be censured. To all intents and purposes they have never had an opportunity to present their claims for adjudication.

They have the opportunity now under section 162 of the judicial code of the United States, and have had it ever since the act of March 3, 1911, went into effect.

How are you going to revive the act of March 12, 1863? I do not see how you are going to revive it unless you reenact it, and you can not reenact it because the conditions of war times of 1863, when this act was passed, can not be made applicable to the conditions of to-day. You will find a memorandum of that act in Fiftieth Court of Claims, at the bottom of page 78 and on page 79. There are seven sections referring to various things. Section 3 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may require the special agents appointed under this act to give a bond with such securities and in such amount as he shall deem necessary, and that he shall cause a book, or books, of account to be kept, and all that sort of thing, of the property taken. How on earth are you going to reenact an act that is as dead as Julius Cæsar? Anything as dead as Cæsar is beyond human resurrection. That was the very contention of the Government in the Lincoln case upon the motion to dismiss the petition because of a nonaverment of loyalty. You will find it in Forty-ninth Court of Claims, on page 303, where the court in its opinion, discussing this phase of the question, said:

Defendants contend that if the abandoned-and-captured-property act is revived by section 162 of the Civil Code it is revived in all its parts.

And one of those parts is that the claimant must show that he did not give any aid or comfort to the rebellion. Here is an act to revive this act in the face of the contention of the Government in that case.

I assume that those who are willing to take the chance of this bill are basing it probably upon a dictum in the opinion in the Austin case, which is reported in One hundred and fifty-fifth United States, 417, but that dictum was not necessary in the decision of that case. What is said there was only the voluntary statement of the court in taking up the contentions of the counsel for claimant and discussing them and expressing the views of the court. What was held in the Austin case is this, and in all probability, if you pass this bill, you will bring it within the principle laid down in that case and defeat the very purpose of the bill and of the friends of these claimants, to wit: "The act of March 3, 1883—authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the successors and representatives of Sterling T. Austin, deceased, for cotton alleged to have been taken from him in Louisiana by the authorities of the United States in 1863, 1864, and 1865—any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that neither Sterling T. Austin, sr., nor any of his surviving representatives gave any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, but were throughout the war loyal to the Government of the United States, made the establishment of loyalty in fact, as contradistinguished from innocence in law produced by pardon, a prerequisite to jurisdiction, and the Court of Claims, having found that the claimant was not thus loyal, properly dismissed the petition." What the court said in its opinion in reference to the contention of the attorneys for the claimants was mere dictum. The court says, on page 432:

It is contended that the words in reference to the establishment of loyalty are in substance the same as those used in the third section of the captured and abandoned property act—

And so forth.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish we could have a little better order. The gentleman is proceeding under great difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that a legal argument is always a very dry subject, and I would not attempt to make this legal argument if I had not been requested to do so, and because it is a matter of very great consequence to a great number of claimants and also to the Government. There is, I think, remaining in this fund yet, either as a fact or at least in theory—and in the eyes of the law the fund is still there—something under $5,000,000. My point is this, that if this bill is enacted into law it is very likely that the court will hold that the claimant is bound to show that he did not give any aid or comfort to the rebellion, just as the court held that such proof was necessary in the Austin case. At any rate, if this act is passed the Government will, in my judgment, be in duty bound to fight that question up through the United States Supreme Court. The Government felt bound to raise it in the Lincoln case, and now, as the law is to-day, as I understand it, the Government is satisfied that all any claimant has to do is just what Evan J. Lide did in 1915—go into the Court of Claims and prove that he owned the property when it was taken and that the net proceeds thereof went into the Treasury of the United States and get his money. What more do you want? If you force the Government to raise this question by this bill it will take three or four years to get up through the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the case just cited by the gentleman, in 1915 the burden of proof was on the claimant to trace the fund into the Treasury of the United States, was it not?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, now, as a matter of fact, does the gentleman know that the Treasury Department of the United States does not divulge any information as to funds that reach the Treasury of the United States until that claimant has filed his claim in the Court of Claims, and as a result does not the gentleman think under the harshness of that rule that it places upon the claimant a burden that no other claimant or no other plaintiff carries under any other rule of government that I know of in courts of law or equity?

Mr. MAGEE. The burden is a heavy burden, but there is not any question about the law. It is conceded by the committee, and the committee is absolutely right, that the claimant must prove that he owned the property when it was taken and that the net proceeds went into the Treasury of the United States. It is a heavy burden. Now, what I say is, why take any chances of imposing this additional burden? Why not take section 162 of the code that has been adjudicated by the court, that has been sustained, where any claimant can go, and if you want to do anything to help a claimant any further, amend an act that has been adjudicated and held by the court to be good?

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. In the gentleman's research—and I can see from his argument that he has made an exhaustive one—has he ever found not only in the law but in the history of any civilized country on earth where an invading army confiscated stores for the subsistence of the army from the nonbelligerents that it did not then and there make a payment in full for the confiscation of such stores for subsistence?

Mr. MAGEE. Now, I will say to the gentleman that the courts make a very clear distinction between acts of confiscation and this abandoned-and-captured-property act. A confiscation act is penal, and what we are discussing here has nothing whatever to do with that. This abandoned-and-captured-property act is remedial and it goes on this theory, that the purpose of the act was that the Government would refund this money to the rightful owners of property that was taken after the practical cessation of hostilities.

Now, hostilities practically ceased on April 25, 1865, when Gen. Joseph E. Johnston surrendered. So that section 162 of the code ought to be amended by striking out the word "June" and substituting the word "May." In other words, there is no reason why an owner whose property was taken in June should have the right to recover and not another owner whose property was taken in the month of May, the two being exactly in the same class. I only want to say, in conclusion, that I have made these suggestions because I have deemed it my duty to do so in the interest of equity and justice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the contention of the gentleman, the relief that is desired can be attained by amending section 162 of the Judicial Code?

Mr. MAGEE. Of the Judicial Code of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there is on the calendar a bill reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws seeking to amend that section?

Mr. MAGEE. That is the bill I referred to in my opening remarks. I am on that committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. And so if we defeat this bill, which the gentleman believes will not attain the purpose sought for, and as the Committee on the Revision of the Laws follows next on the calendar with their bill, can not we attain the very end the gentleman thinks should be attained by amending section 162?

Mr. MAGEE. House bill 8033, reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, would have to be radically amended, but it could be amended.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just a minute. The House will have control when the bill is up to-day, and it can be amended according to the ideas of the gentleman, notwithstanding the report of the committee in that particular.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield right there in that connection? The bill reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws refers to an entirely different classification of property, to wit, property that was captured as abandoned property subsequent to June 1, 1865. That was after the war had ended—not during the belligerent period at all—and the confiscation is of a different class from that to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers.

Mr. MAGEE. No; it refers exactly to the same one as this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 162, I want to say, refers to the identical property as the bill under consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. The records show, in the War Department, millions of dollars worth of property that was confiscated in the belligerent country after the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. MAGEE. Neither bill has reference to that at all. The bill reported, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, deals exactly with this same subject matter.

Now, I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that while these matters do not affect the State which I represent in part, they do affect several States in this Union, and in my official action, while a Member of this House, there can be no East, no West, no North, no South [applause], but only these—yours and mine forever—these United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have but four minutes left, and I prefer to reserve that time.

Mr. FOCHT. I will yield to the gentleman whatever time he wants. Would the gentleman like to have 10 minutes?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will reserve the four minutes that I have unless the gentleman does not wish to use any more time.

Mr. FOCHT. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there are two bills on the calendar, one of which is now under consideration and the other may be under consideration in a few minutes, both relating to funds arising under the captured-and-abandoned-property act. Apparently it is the intention of the majority to endeavor to pass both of these bills. I do not myself understand exactly upon what theory it is desired to pass two bills upon the subject. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] whether the bill now before the House, H. R. 8246, covers this question completely, and if this bill passes whether there is any further need of section 162 of the Judicial Code?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am not acquainted with the provisions of the bill to which the gentleman refers. I have never seen it, but I see no reason for any further legislation if this bill is passed.

Mr. MANN. It is very evident that the committee when they reported this bill, intentionally or unintentionally, took into consideration the other bill, because they have proposed as an amendment to this bill the proposition that nothing contained in this act should be construed to repeal, alter, or amend section 162 of the Judicial Code, and it is clearly expressed in that amendment that this bill is not supposed to interfere with the existing law or the other bill proposing to amend the existing law, and hence this bill is not sufficient to cover the subject.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. My answer to that is that this bill was intended to cover the subject prior to the date of June 1, 1865, which is referred to in section 162 of the code. There was no intention to interfere with the provisions of section 162.

Mr. MANN. Does this bill only refer to funds where the property was captured prior to July 1, 1865?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. By reason of the provision of section 162 this bill does refer only to the property taken prior to June 1, 1865.

Mr. MANN. What is there in this bill that limits it to that date?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Only the amendment providing that nothing in this act shall be construed to alter or amend section 162.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, that is true; but this bill confers, so far as I can see, full authority to file claims as to any property taken under the captured-and-abandoned-property act—complete authority—by an extension of the limitation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. For a period of two years; yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is complete authority by the extension of limitation. Was there anything in the original act which forbade claims to be filed for property taken after July 1, 1865?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No.

Mr. MANN. The original act was passed in 1863, was it not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; in March, 1863.

Mr. MANN. The act of 1864. And is complete so far as it goes, covering all cases arising under the captured-and-abandoned property act.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. You mean the original act?

Mr. MANN. This act.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; this act would have covered all if the amendment had not been adopted which provided that it should not alter or amend the provisions of section 162.

Mr. MANN. Section 162 is merely cumulative; it is not exclusive.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Section 162 provides for anything taken after June 1, 1865. There is no limit upon it. Under that act the claimant would have the right to go into court and under this act he would have the right to go into court for property taken prior to June 1, 1865.

Mr. MANN. If this act passes, would not claimants, for property taken prior to July 1, 1865, have the right to file claims under this act?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think they would have the right to file under section 162 of the code.

Mr. MANN. But under this act?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If they did, it is in the same language. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information. I have not made any objection yet.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have told the gentleman the purpose of the amendment, which was offered by a member of the committee, was not to interfere with a provision of section 162 of the code.

Mr. MANN. That gives two remedies, or a remedy under each one of the two acts, to those whose property was taken after July 1, 1865. Then, except that, this act requires the claim to be filed within two years.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes. There is no limit.

Mr. MANN. And the other act fixes no limitation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No limitation.

Mr. MANN. And both acts remove, as I understand, in effect, proof of loyalty?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This act does not.

Mr. MANN. In effect, I said. Does it not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the court holds in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, it would. I understand that argument has been made that the court would not so hold, but I do not intend to anticipate the decisions of the court. If the court so holds, it will.

Mr. MANN. That is the theory of the bill, is it not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is.

Mr. MANN. The other bill expressly provides that proof of loyalty shall not be required. I know that I am not very harsh or bitter on account of the war. I do not believe that Congress ought to pass an act in reference to these southern claims which is intended to remove the requirement of proof of loyalty. War is war, and when people go into war they take their chances. There can be no war without destruction of property, without the seizure of property, without damage to the people who are engaged in it. It never is and never will be possible to remove the damages or to make recompense for them, and when people engage in war they ought not, after the war is over, plead the baby act and say, "While we took our chances on the war, and have been defeated, we still want you who were the victors to pay us for the property which you took."

In these cases it is true that the Government seized cotton and other property—no one knows how much other property was seized—and sold it, and put the money into the Treasury, where it was carried as a bookkeeping account, but in fact used in carrying on the war. There is no distinction in theory between taking the property and using it for the Army in the South and taking the property and selling it and putting the money in the Treasury and using the money to carry on the Army in the South. There is a slight difference in fact but no substantial difference in principle.

I am not in favor even now of paying those whose property was taken and used by the Army in the South for that property where they were not loyal to the Government. Likewise, I am not in favor of giving them the money where they were not loyal to the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this bill for one or two reasons which I consider good and convincing. I represent a section of this country which was as intensely loyal during the Civil War as any portion of the United States. The district I represent furnished more soldiers to the Union Army than any other district in the United States in proportion to population. A number of counties in that district furnished more Union soldiers than they had voters. Boys enlisted. During the Spanish-American War the smallest county in that district, having 2,500 voters, sent over 500 soldiers to the Spanish-American War, and the record of enlistments during the same war showed that Knoxville, Tenn., stood next to New York City.

During the Civil War we were in the heart of the "enemy's country." Knoxville furnished our great naval leader, Admiral Farragut, and Tennessee sent 31,090 volunteers to the Union Army, not counting hundreds who enlisted and served in the regiments from other States. The records of the War Department in this city show that the Southern States, including Missouri, West Virginia, and Maryland, furnished 317,714 white men to the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps during the Civil War, and 93,346 colored troops, or a total of 406,670. The record by States is as follows:

White soldiers, Army and Navy.

Tennessee	31,092
Texas	1,965
Alabama	2,576
Florida	1,290
Kentucky	75,760
Louisiana	5,224
Mississippi	545
Missouri	109,111
North Carolina	3,156
West Virginia	32,068
Maryland	46,638
Arkansas	8,289
Total	317,714

Colored troops.

Alabama	4,969
Arkansas	5,526
Florida	1,044
Georgia	3,486
Louisiana	24,052
Mississippi	17,869
North Carolina	5,035
South Carolina	5,462
Tennessee	20,133
Texas	47
Virginia	5,723
Total	93,346

Had these 400,000 soldiers fought on the Confederate side it would have imperiled the Union, and to say the least would have prolonged the war for some time. It did not cost much to be loyal to the Government in the North during those stormy times, but it did cost a great deal to be loyal to it in the South. Both armies lived upon our country, for the fighting was in the South, and no little of it was done on the soil of Tennessee—at Knoxville, Chattanooga, Nashville, Franklin, Shiloh, Murfreesboro, and other points. No tongue or pen can tell the sufferings and hardships endured by the southern loyalists during that unfortunate period. When the war was over, the South was devastated. The home and property of the Unionists, as well as that of the Confederates, had been destroyed. A Republican Congress passed a law in 1863 that a loyal citizen of the South must file his claim for captured or abandoned property in the Court of Claims within two years or it would be barred. If these claims were just then, they are just now, and the claimants ought to have had more time in which to file and prosecute for the recovery of their property. Everything was in confusion from 1863 to 1865 in the South, and it resulted in many of these claimants having no opportunity to present their cases within the time prescribed by law, and hence they were denied a hearing by a Government they had loyally and faithfully served and in which service they lost practically all of their property. Now you tell us that although this Government, through its highest tribunal, the Supreme Court, made up of Republicans, has passed upon this question, and in their decision stated that the money realized from captured and abandoned property deposited in the Treasury and held in trust does not belong to the Government, but the rightful title rests with certain people in the South, who were loyal to the Union, you are unwilling to extend the time, and thus give these honest, deserving, and loyal people a day in court. I can not believe that any man in this House will violate his conscience or his oath or his duty as a Representative or will be criticized in the least by his constituents for doing what a Republican Supreme Court said ought to be done.

This property or money in the Treasury held in trust does not belong to the Government of the United States. The highest court in the land has so said. [Applause.]

If the Government has no just and legal title to it, are we performing our faithful duty under the Constitution, and under our oaths, by retaining or withholding something which does not belong to the United States Government? I was pleased and gratified to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE] in his speech state that in the consideration of this bill there should be no section—no North or South, East or West—but that there should be justice, and justice alone. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer again to the matter that I referred to a week ago, when the bill was up, and suggest an amendment which will prevent the consideration in the Court of Claims of any claim that has been actually considered in Congress and unfavorably acted upon.

The proceeding, as I understand it, heretofore has been that a claimant would present his claim to Congress, it would be sent to the Court of Claims for a determination of the facts, and the court would report the facts to Congress, and perhaps a bill would be reported by the Committee on Claims to Congress, and Congress, with all facts before it, would consider the matter on its merits and act favorably or unfavorably. My view of this situation is that any claim that has passed through the court and has been finally presented to Congress and considered on its merits and the action has been unfavorable should never be again presented or considered by the court or Congress.

Without the amendment which I suggest, the course, which I think is wrong, would be open to the claimant. Notwithstanding the fact of a claim passing through that course and unfavorable action by Congress the claimant could now go direct to the Court of Claims; or if this bill is passed, he could ignore Congress and go direct to the Court of Claims, present his case, have the court hear it and determine the facts and the merits of the proposition and perhaps give judgment in his favor, and the money would be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment I shall offer provides that no claim that has been considered by Congress and final action taken shall again go to the court. The court should have no jurisdiction of it.

I think that Congress can perform no higher duty and accomplish no better work than to provide for the proper, prompt consideration of claims and the payment of just claims; but after Congress has once acted, and acted unfavorably, the claimant should be foreclosed from further proceedings. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in charge of the bill admitted a week ago that the course which I think is wrong will be open to a claimant unless the bill is amended. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment which will take away from the court jurisdiction of claims that have been once finally acted upon by Congress.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FOCHT. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there have been various statements in reports and on the floor as to the amount of money which might be involved in this bill and its companion bill and the section of the Judicial Code. All of the claims which could be filed under the Judicial Code section could be filed under this bill. I hold in my hand a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, William P. Malburn, addressed to a Member of this House, in reference to the companion bill on this matter. The companion bill would only cover claims which this bill would cover, but this bill would cover all that the companion bill covers. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury said, under date of January 31 last:

> As to the total amount of such claims now cognizable by the Court of Claims under section 162 of the Judicial Code, or which would be so under that section, as it is proposed to amend it in House bill 8033, you are informed that there are no data available from which such an estimate can be made.

Here is a statement from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, after investigation, that there are no data available from which can be determined the amount of the claims which may be filed or which may be valid under the provisions of the Judicial Code, which would be a part of the claims covered by this bill, although we are told in the report, and by various gentlemen on the floor, that the total amount of claims involved can not exceed, I believe, about a half million dollars. Where they acquire their information it is not necessary to specify, but the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in the most recent communication he has made on the subject, informs us that there is no way of estimating the amount which may be involved.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been reported from the Committee on War Claims six different times, and I assume that that covers a period of probably 20 years; so that it is evident that there has been a common consensus of opinion that this money set aside and now in the Treasury of the United States for the payment of these abandoned-property claims should be paid to those to whom it belongs; but it is a recognized fact that it is most difficult to collect a claim against the United States Government.

It is now more than 50 years since a loyal Congress, assembled in this Hall back in 1863, decreed that this money should be paid to these claimants. Yet it has taken all these years before we were able to bring this question upon the floor of this House for final discussion and disposal.

Mr. Chairman, I come from a district in Pennsylvania—and when I mention the word "Pennsylvania" it must necessarily everywhere ring true to loyalty and patriotism. [Applause.] The district I represent sent the first troops who answered the call of Lincoln, the Logan Guards, of Lewistown, who quartered the same night in the Rotunda of this Capitol. [Applause.] Therefore no man may be mistaken as to where I stand on any question involving loyalty.

Now, it is a historical fact that all of the South did not go out and become disunionist. Kentucky never did go out. Only a part of Tennessee went out. Part of the Carolinas did not go, and it was a close call that even Virginia went out, as any man familiar with the history of that referendum well knows. Therefore, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] has well said, there must have been in the Southland many men who were loyal to the flag and to the Union. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that my position on this question is impelled and actuated solely by the fact that these men must have been loyal, or they can not recover by the aid of my vote these claims; and anyone living in the South during the troublous times of that rebellion who was loyal and who lost property, ought to be paid for it if anybody anywhere ought to be reimbursed; and if this bill does that, as since it is the intelligent judgment of half a century, and a result of the wisdom, the conclusions, and decisions of one supreme judge after another, then I want to vote for the bill, just as I vote for all the pension bills for Union soldiers, because they were loyal. For the opposite reason I can not vote for the Confederate pension bill which will be offered later by the very eloquent gentleman [Mr. TILLMAN] who spoke so beautifully of the valor of the southern soldier, whose courage and heroism have never been denied. I can not vote for that bill because it would be putting a premium upon disloyalty. For that very reason I believe the pending measure ought to appeal to every northern man, Republican, Democrat, or whatever his politics may be, in order that there may be proper restitution to those loyal Union men of the South, or their heirs, who lost their property during the great conflict. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the statement that there is no distinction between the property that was taken and used for the support of the Army and property that was taken under this captured and abandoned property act. This act was passed in March, 1863. A reading of the debate preceding the adoption of the act will show that at that time a large number of bales of cotton in the so-called insurrectionary districts had been taken and sold, and the proceeds converted to the personal use of those who happened to take them. This act was first entitled "An act to prevent the perpetration of frauds." Afterwards it received the title of the captured-and-abandoned-property act; but that it was enacted for the purpose of preventing fraud is apparent from the subsequent history of this legislation; for the act provided that when the cotton was sold the net proceeds should not be used for carrying on the war, as was the case with stores and supplies, but that this money should be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the owner of the property. And the Supreme Court thereafter, in the case of the United States against Padelford, Ninth Wallace, page 543, Mr. Chief Justice Chase, speaking for the Supreme Court, said:

> The Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit; and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.

In case after case the court decided thereafter that this was a trust fund; and when men on the floor of the House ask why these cases were not prosecuted before, the history of this legislation shows that in six Congresses, during Republican and Democratic administrations, the justice of this legislation has appealed to the committees, and six times have bills been reported to this House, and in those reports the passage of this legislation by Congress has been urged.

Never has it been finally acted upon, because Congress failed to take action. Mention has been made of the amount that is involved. The Treasury, in an official circular, stated that the amount left under this fund from cotton amounts to a little more than $4,000,000. It also calls attention to the fact that of the $4,000,000 the sum which was only $500,000 less represented property that had been sold to the Confederate States, and wherever that was done, of course, no individual claimant can show title, and where he can not show title his case must fail. The court has decided that the claimant must trace the cotton from the time it left his hands into the Treasury of the United States. The books of the Treasury represent conclusive evidence there on that question. If he is permitted to go into this tribunal and file his case, he can only recover if the Treasury books show that the money is there to his credit.

Now, one other argument has been made as to loyalty. The act of 1863 provided for loyalty. In making the report I called attention to the fact that notwithstanding that provision of loyalty the Supreme Court had held that it was not necessary to prove it. Now, if they could hold that years ago when hatred inspired the actions of men, when passions were easily aroused, and they can hold that this is a trust fund that belonged to these people, why can not we at this time, when this Congress, regardless of section, answer an appeal such as the gentleman from Illinois made for Abraham Lincoln, when I can do it, when other men from my section can do it, why can not this Congress answer an appeal to give these people the right to recover of the United States this trust fund. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 820), which conferred jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine claims arising from the proceeds of abandoned and captured property, which reads as follows, namely, "Any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may, at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the Court of Claims, and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion, to receive the residue of such proceeds, after deduction of any purchase money which may have been paid, together with the expense of transportation and sale of said property and any other lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof," be, and the same is hereby, revived for the period of two years from and after the passage of this act. And jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said Court of Claims to adjudicate the claims that were filed under the provisions of said act and the petitions dismissed by said court, the act of July 2, 1874 (13 Stat. L., 376), and all other nonintercourse laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, line 17, strike out the word "seventy-four" and insert the word "sixty-four."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to repeal, alter, or amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], for whom I have a very warm affection, just referred to the amount that was involved, referring, however, only to the question of cotton. No one has ever been able to get any authoritative statement except in regard to cotton. Cotton was not the only property that was taken under the captured-and-abandoned-property act. I alluded a moment ago to a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury that there were no data available from which an estimate could be made of the amount involved. I read another line or two from the same letter, in which Assistant Secretary Malburn states:

There is no information available as to the number or probable amount for which claims may be preferred for property other than cotton.

So that the statement as to cotton is not so very valuable. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to the question of loyalty. The original act which it is proposed to revive provides—and that was the intention of Congress when it passed this act in 1863—that no claimant should have a claim unless he proves that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion. That was the intention of Congress when this property was taken. It was not the intention of Congress to take this property and pay the value of it to those who were disloyal. Long since that act went out of use the Supreme Court held that President Johnson by his amnesty proclamation had removed the requirement to prove loyalty. But that does not affect the intention of the Congress which passed the original act, and there is no more reason why we should now remove, as is proposed by this bill in effect, the question of loyalty than there is as to all other of the claims which the claim agents are so earnestly asking should be done.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Where the claimant has long since been dead how can the question of loyalty be established?

Mr. MANN. They have no difficulty about it. They established the question of loyalty in thousands and thousands of these claims for property taken by the Union Army in the South. We have paid thousands of these claims, and have just passed a bill in the House authorizing the Court of Claims to enter judgment in these cases, but according to this bill they have to prove loyalty. You remove from this bill the requirement of proof of loyalty and you have not got a leg to stand on to insist on proof of loyalty in any of the other claims that are left hanging around here and elsewhere.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be appropriate at this time to partially answer the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois and at a later hour to-day to go more extensively into the discussion of the questions involved in these two bills. The immediate question now before the House is the passage of the amendment to this bill which provides that section 162 of the Judicial Code shall remain intact and not be altered, amended, or repealed by the passage of this bill.

They are two distinct and separate propositions. Section 162 of the Judicial Code relates entirely to that class of claims which arose after the Civil War was over. That act is thorough and complete and covers the question involved in all those cases where the property was taken after the 1st of June, 1865. This bill we are now considering refers to those cases particularly in which the property was taken, if the amendment is passed, prior to June 1, 1865. As to the question of loyalty, it is not necessary at this time to discuss it, but the Court of Claims has decided recently in the Lincoln case that under section 162 of the Judicial Code there was no necessity in cases arising under that section to allege and prove loyalty. The principle involved in that case no doubt will go to the Supreme Court sooner or later. However, it so happens that in that particular case on the trial on the merits, after the section had been disposed of, the Government maintained its claim and the suit of the claimant was rejected. Therefore that particular case is eliminated, but the proposition involved in that amendment is not eliminated. No question of loyalty is involved in this bill that we now have before us, and it is entirely superfluous for the gentleman to make any reference at all to the question of loyalty. I hope that the Members on both sides of the Chamber will distinctly understand that this bill as it now stands simply adopts, reenacts, reaffirms all the provisions in the original abandoned-and-captured-property law, which was enacted in 1863.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Why does the gentleman say the question of loyalty is not involved in this legislation? Does the gentleman think that the captured property that belonged to disloyal citizens should be paid for by the United States at this time?

Mr. WATKINS. Whether it should or should not be paid for, the bill makes no provision along that line. There is not a word in this bill which refers to the fact of whether the claimant is loyal or disloyal.

Mr. NORTON. That is just what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] contended, that there was not any provision in respect to it and that there should be.

Mr. WATKINS. The only object of this bill is to eliminate the time limit.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think that in the case of captured property belonging to disloyal citizens the Government at this time should pay for it?

Mr. WATKINS. I will discuss that question——

Mr. NORTON. Oh, the gentleman can answer that yes or no.

Mr. WATKINS. I will take the affirmative side of that and claim that the Government should in those cases which arose after the war was over. That is the next bill we have to dispose of on the calendar to-day.

Mr. NORTON. How about property taken before the war was over?

Mr. WATKINS. As to that question it is not necessary for me at this time to take any position, simply because that is an open question for the courts to determine. Under the amnesty proclamation the courts seem to hold that it makes no difference whether they were loyal or disloyal at the time the property was taken so long as they are loyal at this time.

Mr. NORTON. I want to know what the gentleman thinks about it, because I have great respect for his ability.

Mr. WATKINS. I think that after the President issued his proclamation of amnesty, relieving disabilities and restoring citizenship, all citizens should be put upon an equality; one should stand in the same light as another. We stand here to-day passing enormous amounts of appropriations for the protection of those who fought on the side of the Union in the Civil War, amounting to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars anually, and we also vote money for other appropriations which show that the people of the South no longer hold a prejudice in reference to these matters, and I see no reason why at this late day, when this amnesty proclamation has taken effect, that stigma should rest on the people of the South, if that is a satisfactory answer to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the Members of this House would much prefer to take the frank statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] reporting this bill as to the real purpose involved than the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], who has just spoken. The latter stated that the question involved in this bill is not to grant to those who were disloyal rights that have never been recognized heretofore by this Congress or by the Supreme Court. The gentleman from South Carolina in explaining the bill stated the opposite position. This is the entering wedge on the part of the Democrats to try to have the Congress acknowledge claims of those who were disloyal during the Civil War. Never before has this Congress—and never before has there been any attempt made in this House to have it recognize this character of claims. If we are going to launch upon that policy of raiding the Treasury, then let the Republicans on this floor be fully advised that the purpose of the Democrats is to loot the Treasury by the payment of these claims amounting to millions and millions of dollars. That is the question before the House, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is to be commended for his frankness in saying that it is to remove the bar of disloyalty. Upon the face of the bill that is not apparent, but in his discussion he is frank to admit that in reviving it you are reviving it in connection wth the decision of the Supreme Court in Klein against the United States, Thirteenth Wallace, where an obiter decision of the Supreme Court by Chief Justice Chase held that the amnesty granted by President Johnson would be presumed as throwing a cloak of validity over those claims of disloyal citizens during the Civil War. We may just as well look this squarely in the face.

Last week there was no dissent upon the part of anyone on this side to grant to every person domiciled in the South or anywhere else the right to go into the Court of Claims with claims 50 years old—old, hoary claims, many of them lacking merit, many possessed by claim agents who make a living here in the city of Washington by stirring them up—and present them in the case of stores taken for the use of the Union forces or property used by the Union forces. I ask you, my Republican colleagues, whether you are going to go beyond that, and in the case of cotton, in the case of rice and tobacco, and in the case of other kinds of property grant the right of reimbursement for such property when it was owned by those disloyal to the Government? It extends to all those articles which were left abandoned in the southern fields by loyal and disloyal subjects, and then taken possession of by Treasury agents specially appointed by the Government to take possession of them and sell them and turn the proceeds into the Government. I say it is not right 50 years afterwards, no more than it was right in the days of the Civil War, to grant recognition by this Congress to appropriate the funds of the Government to those who were disloyal in the hours of its need. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, at the end of the section add the following:
"And provided further, That said Court of Claims shall have no jurisdiction of any claim which has heretofore been presented to Congress and in respect to which action by Congress has been taken."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, that is the amendment of which I spoke a moment ago. It seems to me that where claims have been presented to Congress and considered on their merits they ought not again to be permitted to go to the Court of Claims. For the benefit of those who were not here when I spoke a few moments ago I will say a week ago when we were considering this measure I asked the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina in charge of the bill, "Suppose this bill is passed and becomes a law, can one who presented a claim and had it considered on its merits in Congress and unfavorable action was taken upon it, now, or if this bill becomes law, take it to the Court of Claims, disregarding altogether the action taken by Congress, and have the Court of Claims perhaps consider it favorably and enter judgment in his behalf?" The answer of the gentleman from South Carolina was "Yes." Now, I submit that the Congress ought not to open the door to a claimant who has had his day in court and who has been able to present his claim to Congress and have Congress pass upon the merits of it.

I have in mind cases of that kind where claims were presented and considered by the Committee on Claims. They were sent to the Court of Claims, which had authority only to determine the facts. The Court of Claims returned a statement of facts to Congress. The Committee on Claims considered that statement, reported the bill favorably to this House, and the House considered the recommendation of the committee, the statement of facts by the Court of Claims, and considered the merits of the proposition besides; and with all the information before the House the House acted unfavorably. If any claim in the world ought to be deprived of further opportunity of consideration, it is a claim of that kind. Without the amendment that I present the Court of Claims is open to such claims. It ought not to be. Now I believe, as I said before, that this Congress can perform no higher duty than to provide for prompt and full payment of every obligation of the Government, and it is greatly to be regretted that Congress has been derelict of duty in the past. The most difficult thing in the world has been for a claimant to have his claim even considered by Congress, to say nothing of getting payment of it. That is all wrong. If this bill provides for the proper and prompt consideration of claims, it has that merit; but after one has had his day in court, twice considered by the Committee on Claims, once considered by the Court of Claims, and all the facts found and report made to Congress and the matter considered on its merits and finally turned down, that ought to foreclose that claim forever. My amendment will do it. Without it the door will be opened to claimants to make further presentation to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have no more desire than my friend from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] to burden the court with the consideration of cases that have been considered by Congress, but in his desire to correct what he believes to be an evil arising out of the consideration of one case I believe that great injustice would be done to many claimants. The gentleman has in mind one case. Since we have had this bill up for consideration last Wednesday I know of another case where not a disloyal but a loyal person, a citizen of the State of Ohio, having a case under this captured and abandoned property act, went not only into Congress but into the court for the purpose of recovering proceeds turned into the Treasury. It was necessary for him to trace his money into the Treasury and prove it by the books of the Treasury. He traced it down to where it was taken and carried on the boat, traced to the agent of the Treasury Department, who sold it, but when it came to the books of the Treasury Department and they were called for, the Secretary of the Treasury responded that the books did not show that the proceeds were turned into the Treasury, and the case of the plaintiff was dismissed. Thereafter the claimant came before the Committee on War Claims because of some additional evidence. That committee called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for this identical information, and in an official letter from the Secretary of the Treasury they certified that that cotton, belonging to a man named Donnelly and a man named Egan, was turned into the Treasury and was to their credit. Because there is no provision of law by which he could go into that court he is therefore denied the opportunity, a loyal citizen, a man whom the Secretary of the Treasury now says is credited on his books with having that cotton—as I say, there is no tribunal into which he could go to prove his case. I submit that for that reason the gentleman's amendment should not be adopted.

Now, we know what has happened. Bills have been introduced by Members of this House; they have been considered by the committee, have been reported here favorably by us, but have not been acted upon, but have remained upon the calendar, and under this amendment that man will be denied the right of going into court——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. My amendment refers to where action is taken by Congress on claims and only where action is taken. The statement of the gentleman from South Carolina is not correct, if he will pardon me.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. My statement was made upon the construction I placed upon the amendment when it was read, for it does not state what action, whether based upon the merits of the case or whether dismissed at the end of the session for some reason or other. The number of cases that could be affected by it are infinitesimal.

Now, suppose in the case the gentleman referred to it had been acted upon on its merits, wherein is the harm of allowing that man to go into court; for, after all, under the provisions of the bill he must trust his case to show that the proceeds were placed in the Treasury to his credit notwithstanding any action of Congress in the past. If he can not do it now under this law he can not recover. When the gentleman speaks of the large amount of money that can be made, the statement shows the profit derived from that cotton was turned into the Treasury for which nobody can bring suit, and premium upon gold for which no man can bring suit. And I reiterate what I said before, that the amount available for payment can in no case exceed $500,000, and under this bill no man can recover unless the Treasury Department books show that he is entitled to do so.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Is it not a fact that a very large number of these claims are no longer filed by the real claimants, but have been assigned?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the law provides specifically that no assignment of any claim made before the decision of the court, and even before the warrant has been issued, is valid, and, therefore, any assignment of it which has been made is invalid under the statutes of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have been reflecting seriously over the questions involved, and I feel I can not afford to do injury to the feelings I have by not expressing some thoughts.

I was very much interested in the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. Now, to place my antecedents right. I was born in South Carolina, the State that threw the first bombarding shell into the face of the American eagle. All my antecedents and predilections are southern, but I am not going to ask that this measure include a man who is or was disloyal to the Union. The Supreme Court has settled all that as to this bill. If we open up the Treasury with the funds that belong to the Union to make good the damage that was done to the property of the disloyalists and the destruction of property of the disloyalists, you would have the same equity to open up the Treasury to the destruction of life and put them upon the general pension roll. That can not be. The doctrine of all governments forbids such conduct. But I want to say this for the loyal people in the South, that they suffered in a way that the northern citizen can hardly comprehend. And I would be sad to see some fellow up in the northern loyal sections vote against recognizing the claim of some loyal subject in the South simply because he was in the hotbed of secession. Those people lost not only their property but they lost their standing in political life and were ostracized. Just 8 miles from the town of Centralia, Ill., there lives to-day, I think, for I have not heard that he is dead, a man of about my age, whose father was a loyal citizen of the county in which I live. He not only had to abandon his home but he left in the night, and this boy took his mother and sister in a little two-ox cart, abandoned their crops and everything on earth they had, and started for loyal country through the Indian Territory. I am sure that that man can make a just claim to this Government for a large herd of cattle that was sold for Confederate taxes and other property, because there was nobody to pay the tax. They were abandoned. I am sure that man could present a claim for abandoned property and destruction that would be as just and righteous as any claim that could be presented to any Government.

Now, my friends, let me lay this fact down—namely, that this Government is a Republic. It rests upon the will of the people under fundamental laws known as our Constitution; and so the question of loyalty or disloyalty, as I understand, is not raised in this bill, because it simply seeks to give life and legal existence to a section of law that was in existence in 1863 that did require loyalty, which has been defined and construed by the Supreme Court. That is my understanding of the question, and all this discourse of loyalty and disloyalty is, to my mind, out of the question, having been passed upon by the Supreme Court. But if it is a question, I want to beg, implore, and supplicate this body to leave the door open for the courts and for those people who suffered so much in order to be loyal to the Union in the Southern States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if a Supreme Court, overwhelmingly Republican, the highest binding power in all matters of equity and justice in this Republic, tells us that these claims represented property and taxes unlawfully and wrongfully taken, enforced by a military order, then surely there can be no desire to serve the ends of justice by those who would inject the question of loyalty.

If the money and taxes were wrongfully taken, this Government has no right to withhold it; and to do so is to commit a wrong in the name of the Government against a helpless people as victims and make the Government itself disloyal to the very foundation principles of all government, which is justice; and justice is that heaven-born principle without which the earth would be a bedlam of wrong and a maelstrom of misery and governments would be an aggregation of anarchy, despotism, and tyranny. The cry that our Republican friends have made over the question of loyalty only shows that they are in such political straits that they are willing to fan the flames of sectional strife and debase a sacred principle to party perfidy.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending which I would like to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Chair will first ask if this is an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. SLOAN. No; it is an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us dispose of the other amendment first. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the enacting clause. However, I will hold it for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no claim shall be allowed any claimant unless it is proved that the original owner was loyal to the United States Government during the Civil War."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment for this reason: For years the rule has been followed in war claims drawn on the line of the claimant's loyalty. I think this not only a good rule for the Government but it is a good rule for both sides in this House. If, as suggested by the argument of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] and the discussion in reply to that, we are extending the time—that is, removing the bar of the statute—and after that is done depending upon a doubtful court decision to relieve claimants from the proof of loyalty when asserting their claims, it is a very doubtful and unwise procedure.

I believe that every dollar's worth of property that this Government has seized under the conditions contemplated in this act, and the money now in the Treasury belonging to loyal citizens of the United States—that is, those loyal during the period of the war when the seizure took place—ought to be taken out of the Treasury and paid to the claimants.

I know that there is a great deal of pressure brought to bear upon Members of the House upon that side to insist on opening the doors for the filing of claims and the allowance of claims through congressional action and judicial decision that will extend the scope of payment of war claims. But I believe that those on the other side of the aisle, so far as they are concerned, would be personally pleased if that scope were not extended. We know from this side that very frequently strong pressure is brought to bear for claims to be asserted against the Government of a somewhat doubtful nature. If we adhere to the salutary rule of allowance only in cases of loyalty, it will simplify the procedure hereafter. I think that if this amendment which I submit is made a part of the statute, any honest claimant with a fair measure of proof not only of his ownership but of his loyalty or the loyalty of the owner of the property at the time it was seized ought to have the right to go before a proper tribunal and establish his ownership. But proof of ownership should not be enough. He should prove the loyalty of the owner at the time the seizure took place. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SLOAN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all judgments rendered under this act shall be paid to the original owner or to his legal representative by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois a moment ago said he wished to be recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: "Page 3, line 2, after the word 'or,' insert the words 'in case of his death, to his widow; and if no widow survive, then to his children or their descendants per stirpes.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is clear from the reading. It is intended to restrict the right of recovery to the original owner, or to his widow in case he is not living, or to his children, or to their descendants. I think the sentiment of this House is strongly opposed to allowing the Treasury of the United States to be looted for the benefit of claim agents who obtain assignments of these very questionable claims.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. You do not claim it is to loot the Treasury for paying a man for cotton taken?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but I have no hesitancy in saying it is purely loot, and nothing but loot, when you attempt here, 50 years after the war, to appropriate the funds of the North and of the South for the payment of hoary claims of those who were disloyal during the Civil War.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the purpose of this bill, as frankly admitted by the chairman, who reported the bill, and we on this side are opposed to paying the claims of those who were disloyal.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not yield at present.

We will grant, and offer no objection to the payment of the claims of those who were loyal; but certainly 50 years after the war no one who has any drop of loyal blood in his veins would be willing to loot—deliberately loot—the Treasury of the United States to the extent of millions of dollars for the payment of claims of those who were disloyal. You can go before the country on that issue. We will accept your gauge.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of this amendment is to limit the payment to those who were the original owners or the widows of the original owners, if living, or, if the widows do not survive, to the children or their descendents. Naturally anyone who is acquainted with these claims knows that these claim agents have made a business of purchasing these very questionable and doubtful claims. These bills largely have their genesis in that fact on the part of these claim agents.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] first.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Who was responsible for the delay of 50 years in collecting these perfectly legal and just claims?

Mr. STAFFORD. No one has been willing heretofore to come before the House and present such a claim. Just now we will test the sentiment of the House on the question whether these claims shall be paid only to those who were loyal during the trying days of the Civil War. Those on the other side voted almost unanimously, a minute ago, in favor of the payment of claims of those who were disloyal.

Now I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know from the gentleman whether the agents who represent the people behind these claims are any more dishonest than those who represented the pensioners or those who represented the claims of the loyal people or those who represent northern claims? Are they not the same type of agents, going out for the same purpose all along the line?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; it is generally known that——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Are they not the same people?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. It is generally known that if a person has a pension claim, he does not need to have a claim agent to intercede with a Congressman to pass a private bill. The Representatives in Congress are only too willing and desirous to do that, and it is an entirely different character of claim. The law acknowledges and approves of that character of claims, but for 50 years we have never recognized the payment of a claim of one who was disloyal during the Civil War.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BLACKMON. Does not the gentleman think that where property was taken and the claim is just, payment ought to be made for it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, Mr. Chairman, only last week, on Calendar Wednesday, the House without a dissenting voice passed a bill granting to every person in the South or in the North who had a claim based upon the taking of his property, stores, and supplies by the Union forces, or the use of his property, the right to go to the Court of Claims and prove it, provided he was loyal. Now, however, you are seeking to make the entering wedge to pay claims of those who were disloyal, and that is the only purpose of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, it had been hoped that no attempt to incite sectional prejudice would ever again be seen upon this floor. It has remained for the gentleman from Wisconsin—happily not for any great statesman of the country, but for the gentleman from Wisconsin—when everybody else is at peace, when everybody else is in a happy frame of mind, when brotherly love is the controlling spirit throughout the Nation, it has remained for the gentleman from Wisconsin to dive into this cesspool and attempt again to create sectional feeling upon the floor of this House. The gentleman will get no reply from us. He is welcome to a monopoly of that kind of talk. [Applause.] We are American citizens, as true to the flag and as loyal to this country as he or any of the people whom he represents. [Applause.] When the Nation was in trouble a few years ago and the loyal men of the North went to the defense of the flag a southerner marched to the martial music of our country alongside every northern soldier. [Applause.] And if unhappily we should have trouble now I apprehend that a defense of the flag will come more unanimously from our section than from that part where the hyphenated citizen dwells and controls. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says it is "loot" to demand payment of an honest debt. No man upon that side can say that it is not an honest debt. The Government took the property. They sold it and put the proceeds into the Treasury and kept the money as a trust fund for years; and in the Fifty-first Congress, when Thomas B. Reed was Speaker of this House, a Judiciary Committee of this House, appointed by him, brought in this bill and advocated its passage. Ever since the Forty-ninth Congress these claimants have been knocking at the door of Congress and asking, for what? Not a payment, but the poor privilege of going into a court of justice, a Federal court, and letting the judges appointed by the President of the United States, under their oaths of office, say whether or not these claimants ought to be paid. That is all there is to it, and the difference in these cases is that the bill we passed last week was simply for stores and supplies and use and occupation, while this bill carries payment of money actually received for goods taken and sold and the money paid into the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, no man who is jealous of the honor of his country, no man who believes in justice and fair play, no man who believes that the Government, like an individual, should pay an honest debt, can object to this bill. All patriotic men North and South, all men blessed with the attributes of genuine manhood, and all men who really love their country buried sectionalism years ago. When the sons of the South, outnumbered and overpowered, laid down their arms at Appomattox they accepted in good faith the terms of the contract then entered into between Lee and Grant, and from that day until this good hour the compact on our part has been sacredly kept. The soldiery and the patriotic men of the North have likewise kept the faith, and the sweet harmony of brotherly love throughout the years has not been disturbed save for an occasional discordant note emitted by some carrion crow of politics who could not attract attention to his malodorous and infinitesimal entity in any other way. Thanks to the good sense and the patriotism of the American people, the puny efforts of these ghoulish demagogues have proven abortive, and while some of the breed are still left among us, they are growing less in number as the years go by, and there is every promise that their kind will soon be extinct. Like the mule, "They have no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity."

These men who boast of their loyalty now were not old enough to shoulder a rifle in the "sixties," but they were old enough in 1898, when this country went to war with Spain, and I will venture the assertion that not one of the men upon this floor who is now attempting to rekindle the dead embers of sectional hate volunteered at that time to defend the flag. If the martial gentlemen who are now so much concerned about "loyalty" ever exposed or offered to expose their precious hides to Spanish bullets, I have never heard of the fact. The lions of the "sixties" are dwelling together in peace and amity, while the coyotes and jackals of this day are just beginning to fight.

Mr. Chairman, this performance is nauseating, sickening, and disgusting to all decent and patriotic men, North and South. We are one people, of one country, and with one flag. The issues which unhappily divided us were settled by the stern arbitrament of war, and those issues are settled forever. The man who would attempt to again raise the standard of sectional hate, who would again attempt to revive issues long since dead, who would attempt to again array State against State and brother against brother in this Republic, is an enemy to the flag and disloyal to his country.

This bill is simply providing a means by which the Government may discharge some of its honest obligations. The bill does not appropriate a dollar. It simply opens the door of the Court of Claims to people who insist that the Government owes them certain moneys. It gives them the chance to be heard, which they have been pleading for for more than 40 years, and which hitherto has been denied them. They ask for a chance to be heard before a court created by Congress, and we may be sure they will not secure judgment unless they are clearly entitled to it. Congress can not shirk the duty of providing a forum for these claimants where justice, simple justice, may be done.

Mr. MANN. It was not this side of the House that introduced a sectional matter; it was the other side of the House. It was not the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] who introduced it; it was the Committee on War Claims which reported the bill into the House. Always in the consideration of these matters it has been thought proper to insert proof of loyalty before claims against the Government growing out of the Civil War should be allowed; but forsooth now, because we are asking that that be done, gentlemen on the other side of the House insist that we are calling up the past. Our friends over there, some of them, are very desirous of having the two sections of the country love each other, accompanied with an appropriation. Their affection can be purchased only with the payment of money out of the Treasury. If we have to throw out the question of loyalty in order to appease our friends over there, the time may come—I do not know—when we may be willing to purchase their good will in that way. I had supposed, from the expressions and the actions of men from the South, that they were just as loyal as we. I believe they are. I do not believe that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is correct when he thinks that we have to purchase the loyalty or the affection of the South by removing the charge of disloyalty in connection with the presentation of claims.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman from Florida did not make any such statement about purchase. The gentleman from Florida insists that if you mean business you ought to permit the Government of the United States to pay these people what it honestly owes them; that is all.

Mr. MANN. We have paid all the people that we honestly owed. We do not owe one cent—not one cent—to the men who endeavored to destroy the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have never recognized such a claim. It is seldom that such a claim has been made. Men took their chances in the war. If we have to forget and forgive by the payment of money, we prefer to revive old recollections. We are willing to extend to the South every right and privilege that we extend to other portions of the country. I do not think it is necessary to buy the South by making appropriations which we would not make anywhere else.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would be untrue to the section that I hail from, to the traditions of the South, to every sense of honor and decency of the people whom I represent in part, if I should permit this uncalled-for and untruthful attack to stand against my people. The people of the South have been as brave and patriotic as any people of this great country. I do not believe that there is another man on that side of the House who in the light of truth and history would make such a slanderous charge against the southern people. They are as brave a people as ever lived. They love this Union to-day far better than some who live in other sections of the country. [Applause.] Since the struggle of the sixties they have fought for that flag and will fight for it if ever war shall come again. The South is not for sale. The southern people endured the hardships and privations of war for what they believed was right; they endured the hardships and privations of reconstruction, living faithfully by the compact made by Lee and Grant at Appomattox. They have stood loyally by that compact. They settled forever the question of secession, a question that had to be settled by the sword. At this time, when this side is seeking to have a just settlement of claims, nobody should inject such a question into this debate as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has done. Let these matters be tried out on their merits; but let no such vulgar and slanderous attack as that made by him be heard on the floor of this House; and I want to say in conclusion that nobody but a coward and a vulgarian would make such a slanderous attack as he has made. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FOCHT: Page 3, add as a new section to follow section 2 the following:

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 20 per cent of the amount recovered for services rendered, and any contract executed after the passage of this act providing for compensation in any sum exceeding said 20 per cent shall be void. Any person violating the provisions of this section by exacting, collecting, withholding, or receiving any sum in excess of said 20 per cent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

My BYRNES of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this amendment that he has offered is in the same language as the amendment that was adopted to the Mann bill the other day?

Mr. FOCHT. It is exactly the same language.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We will accept that.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to meet the objections of gentlemen who are afraid of the alleged claim grabbers who are said to be around Washington. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret, indeed, that gentlemen on the other side of the House have declined to concur in the amendment respecting loyalty. I understand my young friend, the acting chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, that he would accept the amendment as to loyalty; and while it seems entirely clear under these decisions and as written in the bill of 1863 that loyalty is imperative and the fact is that the bill is predicated on loyalty, I am surprised that the gentleman should raise an objection to it. You on the Democratic side must know how utterly hopeless it is to expect this Government to pay anybody for anything who was disloyal. I say the real reason why the Republicans should vote for the bill is because of the loyalty of the men in the Southland who in the midst of the conflict of civil strife had the courage and the heart to stand for the flag of the Union. That is the reason we want to pay them, but unless you withdraw your objection as to the question of loyalty your case will be impossible.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that my good friend from Pennsylvania should be under the impression that I told him that I would accept the amendment to which he refers. I am satisfied that I did not do that, and that he certainly misunderstood me. What I told him and what I have said in this report is certainly very plain. The Mann bill that passed the House last week applied to a class of cases known as the stores and supplies and use and occupation. That was where property was sold and the proceeds used for carrying on the war. Loyalty has always been required, and as a member of this committee I never voted for a bill where loyalty was not required.

But this class of cases stands on an entirely different footing. Therefore it has never been suggested in connection with the consideration of the stores and supplies and use and occupation bill, but this provided for the reviving of the captured and abandoned property act, and that act did require a proof of loyalty; but thereafter the court decided—not the Congress but the court decided—that because after the passage of the act of March, 1863, Congress authorized the President to grant amnesty on condition, and the President in the exercise of that discretion granted amnesty on condition that men took the oath of allegiance; thereafter the Supreme Court of the United States said in the exercise of its function, exclusively an executive one, but which in this case had the additional authority of legislative action, that the President had said to the people of the South "If you take the oath of allegiance under the captured and abandoned property act, differing from these other cases, your property rights are restored, and no power can take from you the right to recover, for the Government never intended to confiscate the property of loyal owners." It was because of the decision of the Supreme Court that I called attention to it in the report on this bill. If I had wanted to deceive anyone, I should have said in the report that it was to remove the statute of limitations, but I wanted to apprise the House of the fact that when you did vote for the bill you would do so in the light of the decisions of the court.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, the question, it seems to me, is this: The property was taken from the southern people, and the proceeds, to a large extent, were turned into the Treasury of the United States. Are not the people who lost this property entitled to at least the actual price for which the property sold?

The question of loyalty can not enter into a consideration of this matter, unless you are willing to deliberately take the property justly belonging to citizens of the United States without one penny of compensation therefor. No honest Confederate soldier is going to admit that he was loyal to what was at that time called "the Union." Few southern men were disloyal to the cause for which they fought. Our people believed that, having made a bona fide purchase of what was then termed "slaves," they were entitled to compensation for them when called upon to give them up. The northern people sold the slaves to our people, and we did not consider it fair that they should be given up without some measure of reimbursement. Mr. Lincoln, whom we all know to be a great statesman, shared in and expressed this view.

All this talk about the Civil War and its horrors from the Republicans come from the fellow who has never faced powder, unless it be talcum powder, and I doubt his ability to face very much of that. [Laughter.]

The war is over, and the man from the South is equally as loyal to the present Union as the man from the North. Why, then, should the issues surrounding that period of our history be renewed on this occasion?

I am as loyal to the Union as any man who occupies a seat in this body. Still I believe that the noble men who fought on the Confederate side were as loyal as any men who ever lived. I regard it as the cheapest demagogy to continue to raise the sectional question, and, in my judgment, the Member of Congress who continually brings up this subject is unworthy of a seat on the floor of this House.

The point is simply this: If the citizen had a right to the property taken from him, he is entitled to have it paid for, whether he be a Confederate soldier or a Federal soldier. So I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that all this talk about the Civil War and the disasters incident thereto be eliminated, and the man who persists in talking it ought to be eliminated, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the committee is in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

At the request of Mr. AUSTIN, the amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LLOYD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stats. L., p. 820), and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SLOAN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLOAN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on War Claims, with instruction to report the bill back forthwith, with the following amendment: Insert in line 13 on page 2, after the word "acts," the words "Provided, That no claim shall be allowed any claimant unless it is proved that the original owner was loyal to the United States Government during the Civil War."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-seven Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to recommit with instructions.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 184, nays 170, answered "present" 5, not voting 75, as follows:

On the vote:

Mr. GREGG (against motion) with Mr. PETERS (for motion).

Mr. HUGHES (against motion) with Mr. DALLINGER (for motion).

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (against motion) with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (for motion).

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I voted no. I am paired with Mr. MCFADDEN, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. DEWALT's name was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of reporting the bill back to the House with the following amendment: Add at the end of section 1 the following:

Provided further, That no claim shall be allowed any claimant unless it is proved that the original owner was loyal to the United States Government during the Civil War—in accordance with instructions of the House.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill as amended was passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Samuel Gompers on the subject of the eight-hour day, which I have agreed with him to insert, and my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of his remarks a letter from President Samuel Gompers and his reply to the same. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he had to work over eight hours a day to prepare it?

Mr. BORLAND. Whether I had to work over eight hours? No; I work over eight hours a day, but not to prepare an answer to that letter.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman would improve it if he worked less.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman from Illinois himself works more than eight hours.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear what is happening over there between these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Missouri is to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter which he has received from Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, on the eight-hour amendment, and the reply of the gentleman from Missouri thereto. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish some resolutions in the RECORD on the question of the submission of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on resolutions submitting a constitutional amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the House there was incorporated in the RECORD by the chairman of the Post Office Committee [Mr. MOON] certain letters written by me to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Blakslee. I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein the reply I made to those letters previously incorporated in the RECORD by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain letters in answer to certain other letters inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman to what letters he refers?

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I was in receipt of two letters from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General calling in question certain remarks I made before the House in reference to rural mail delivery. I am advised that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] incorporated those letters in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I desire to have incorporated the reply which I made to those letters.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker. I will ask now in this connection to incorporate in the RECORD an address recently made by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General on the subject of the rural service.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does it pertain in any way to the letters of which I have just spoken?

Mr. MOON. I think not in any way. It is simply a statement of the views and the policy of the department on the general question.

Mr. REAVIS. I have no objection.

Mr. MOON. I will say this, however, that if there is anything in the address which at all refers to the gentleman personally, or anyone else personally, I will not put it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman whether or not this was the address made at Bay City, Mich., to which he refers?

Mr. MOON. The address was made in the last two weeks either in Tennessee or Arkansas, I have forgotten which.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska coupled with the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if this address and the letters are to go into the body of the RECORD or to be put in the back of the RECORD where they should go?

Mr. REAVIS. It was my intention to incorporate them in the back of the RECORD, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The original letters were inserted in the body of the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. But that was at a time when the Post Office bill was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. I certainly do not want to make any reflection on the action of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], though I doubt very much the propriety of one Member of Congress inserting in the RECORD a letter from a department chief addressed to another Member criticizing what another does.

Mr. MOON. Whether that be correct or not is a question. However, those letters are in the RECORD, and I have no objection to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] inserting his reply. But in that same connection I think it is but fair to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that there be inserted in the RECORD an address in which he discusses that whole question.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to incorporate these letters in the body of the RECORD. I shall be satisfied if I am given consent to put them in the back of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and these letters and the speech will be inserted in the back of the RECORD.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. AYRES. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General relative to the collectors of and deliverers of mail; that is, the reduction of city carriers to collectors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] asks unanimous consent to print a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General about the collection of mail. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if any gentleman knows whether in view of the large number of letters which are being inserted in the RECORD, written by various officials in the Post Office Department, they have time to transact any other business there?

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman knows, he will answer. [Laughter.] Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of grippe.

ALLEGATION AND PROOF OF LOYALTY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. WATKINS (when the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was called). Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] rise?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WATKINS. I am about to call up the bill H. R. 8033.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] rise?

Mr. LEVER. I was going to submit a request for unanimous consent that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be passed without prejudice and retain its place on the call for next Wednesday.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state, Mr. Speaker, in consideration of the fact that the gentleman from South Carolina desires to call up a matter of momentous interest to the entire country, I have no objection, if that is agreeable to the House, but I do not want to lose my place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] requests that the bill which was named by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] be passed until next Wednesday without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the Committee on Revision of the Laws has one bill on the calendar that has been out for a week or two and another bill on the calendar which was reported yesterday. On the latter bill the report has not yet come in. It is just a little, short bill of about 250 or 300 pages. I suppose if this goes over the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] will call that bill up and waste at least two days on it. I do not think he ought to be given that opportunity, and therefore I object.

Mr. WATKINS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MANN. I will withhold it for a moment.

Mr. WATKINS. It is my purpose to call up the bill next which refers to the necessity of proving loyalty. That bill will necessarily consume all the next day and bring it up to the lengthy bill to which the gentleman refers. However, with only the right to two Calendar Wednesdays, it would be perfectly impossible to consider the long bill to which the gentleman refers inside of two calendar days, and I would not feel like trying to get that bill up on the Wednesday Calendar if I could possibly get it up under any other rule.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "if he can possibly get it up." I am not willing to take chances on the "if."

Mr. WATKINS. I will go a little further with the gentleman from Illinois and state to him that the chairman of the Committee on Rules is not here now, but he has been telegraphed to and expects to be here in a day or two. He promised before he left here that he would see that the rule was brought into the House allowing that bill to come up and be considered at some other time than on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. It has been forcibly brought to our notice that the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, is not here; but I do not see that that interferes with the rules of the House or prohibits somebody receiving communications as acting chairman of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana call up his bill?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, yes, sir; I wish to call up the bill H. R. 8033, a bill to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8033) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8033, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8033) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 162. The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of any claim therefor filed within two years from the date of the passage of this bill of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any prior statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims."

SEC. 2. That all laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

With a committee amendment as follows:

On page 1 strike out, in lines 8 and 9, "the date of the passage of this bill" and insert "and after January 1, 1917."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some understanding, if we can have it, as to the time to be consumed on the other side. We have requests for time on this side sufficient to take up an hour.

Mr. MANN. The rule provided for the length of time.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] be kind enough to tell me how much time he expects to take? In other words, I have requests for more than one hour's time, and I probably have only one hour.

Mr. MANN. That is probably all you will get.

Mr. WATKINS. I want to find out from the ranking member of the minority how much time he desires.

Mr. MANN. You limited yourselves to an hour. I did not vote for the rule.

Mr. WATKINS. I have an hour, but I want to see if we can get more than an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this is the same bill as has been passed twice by the House of Representatives and has gone to the Senate and failed to be reached on the calendar on the Senate side, and it has not yet been enacted into law. I am informed that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate has unanimously reported this same bill for passage by the Senate at this session of Congress.

If there is any reason why this bill at this time should not be passed, I am not advised of it. We have only just a few moments ago passed a bill with reference to captured and abandoned property, the proceeds of which remain in the Treasury of the United States, credited to the persons from whom the property was taken—a bill requiring the allegation and proof of loyalty for all of those claims which arose prior to June 1, 1865. During the argument on the consideration of that bill there seemed to be a confusion in the minds of some of the Members between the provision contained in that bill which has just been passed and the provision in the bill which we now have under consideration.

The distinction is clear. There is no connection whatever between the two propositions. In 1911 the Judicial Code was passed, and under section 162 of the Judicial Code it was provided that in all of those cases where property was taken after June 1, 1865, under the captured and abandoned property act of 1863, where the proceeds of the property remain in the Treasury of the United States, those who were entitled to the proceeds could present their claims to the Court of Claims for adjudication, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding.

When that enactment was placed in the Judicial Code it was not contemplated that the representative of the Government would place obstacles in the way of the presentation and consideration for payment of those claims on account of the loyalty or disloyalty of the claimants, because of the fact that those claims and the claims referred to in this bill relate only to the proceeds of property which was taken after June 1, 1865, after the war was over, and we did not contemplate at the time section 162 was inserted in the code that a claim would be set up by the Government against the payment of these just dues on account of the question of loyalty. But the representative of the Government did so. He filed an exception in the Lincoln case and other cases which were filed shortly after that law became operative—it went into effect January, 1912—he filed an exception stating that it was necessary both to allege and to prove loyalty in these claims, the same as in the case of those claims which arose before the close of the war.

In that exception he confuses the requirements in sections 159, 160, and 161 of the Judicial Code with those of section 162, which were not on the same subject, which were separate and distinct matters, which did not relate to the same cause of action at all. Those claims under sections 159 and 160 arose out of laws preceding the enactment of the captured and abandoned property act. Those cases did require proof of loyalty, and it would have been perfectly appropriate for an exception of that kind to have been filed with reference to those cases where they came under the provisions of those sections 159, 160, and 161, but as to section 162 there was no requirement of proof of loyalty. Under section 162 the provisions of the act of 1863 were simply extended to apply particularly to those cases which arose after June 1, 1865, when, hostilities having ceased, the two sections of the Union having come together under one flag, it should no longer be necessary to allege and prove loyalty in those cases.

However, as that exception was filed, we thought it would be necessary to make it perfectly clear to the courts, largely for the purpose of saving time which would otherwise be consumed in taking an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and awaiting the result of that case on decision in the United States Supreme Court. In the meantime one claim was presented in the case known as the Lincoln case, in which upon trial on its merits the Court of Claims found that the facts in the case did not justify a recovery on the part of the plaintiff. That case was intended to be made a test case upon this question. It was contemplated that the attorney for the case would take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and we would meet with two or three years' delay, to which I have referred. But on the merits of the case, the court deciding against the claimant, it was no longer necessary for the Government to take an appeal, and some other case will have to be used as a test for the purpose of seeing whether or not the final decision of the United States Supreme Court will be for or against the proposition of alleging and proving loyalty.

Now, it is for the purpose of dispensing with this necessity, for the purpose of saving this time, for the purpose of allowing these claimants, many of whom are old and destitute and going in a short time to their graves, to present their claims to the Court of Claims, that we have reported this bill. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the attorney for the Government has allowed some of these claims—two of them I have now before me for reference—has allowed the claims to be adjudicated by the Court of Claims without interposing this objection requiring allegation and proof of loyalty. But these two claims are small. It may be that there was some other reason besides the fact that he was convinced by the decision of Judge Howry in the Lincoln case that it was not necessary to prove loyalty which prevented him from interposing the exception requiring the allegation and proof of loyalty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment to section 162 is passed it will have a twofold effect. It will first eliminate the necessity of alleging and proving loyalty in cases arising under the captured and abandoned property act of 1863. It will dispense with the necessity of proving loyalty in that class of cases, and it will also show to this great country of ours, both North and South, that the feeling which existed in this country many years ago is at last at an end. It will go to show that there is a feeling of unity and of brotherhood between the two sections. No act of Congress has ever yet been passed going to show that there was that spirit of amity between the two sections of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the peaceful soul of Stonewall Jackson has taken its eternal flight. The sword of Lee has been sheathed forever. The martial spirit of Jefferson Davis has gone to its long, long home, and by a Republican President his name has been restored to the tablet on Cabin John Bridge, uniting and joining together the North and the South. A spirit of amity prevails throughout this country. During the Spanish-American War the boys who wore the gray commingled with the boys who wore the blue as they marched shoulder to shoulder in the defense of our common country. And, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to passing bills for the purpose of rewarding for their services the soldiers of the North the people of the South have made no complaint, and in a Democratic Congress, composed largely of Members from the South, these bills are passed by an overwhelming majority. There is no reason at this time why any spirit of sectionalism should longer prevail, and it should not be contended now at this late day that it is necessary to allege and prove loyalty in cases before the Court of Claims for those people whose property was taken under this law, after the cessation of hostilities, after the war was ended. Certainly that should no longer be required; and this being the object of the bill, it seems to me there should be no serious objection to its passage, but that it should pass by the unanimous vote of both sides of the House. I do hope that there will be no vigorous contest on the other side. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire to be heard on the bill?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I can see nothing whatever objectionable in this bill. The courts have held that the proof of loyalty is not essential in these cases. The fact is that there remains in the Treasury something over $4,000,000 of money, all of it the proceeds of cotton taken after the Civil War was over. The courts have held that the money, the proceeds of that cotton, is held by the Treasury of the United States in trust for the owners, as they may prove ownership. I can see no objection whatever to this bill and shall vote for it.

I yield 20 minutes of my hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I did not expect to speak at this moment. I have been very anxious to say something to the House on the subject of the international situation, which is a delicate and difficult subject to handle.

There is a great deal of misunderstanding among the great masses of the people as to the meaning of international law. The impression seems to prevail that there is somewhere a code of rules, laws, and regulations defining what wars are justifiable and what wars are not justifiable. We all know that international law deals only with the rules of the game of war. It does not concern itself with the question whether a war has a valid or an invalid cause, whether it is a justifiable or unjustifiable war.

A few days ago Members of Congress looked to the headlines of the papers, in order to get light on the international situation. Members of the National Legislature of the Republic look to the unreliable, misleading, and very often inspired news appearing in the columns of newspapers for information as to the condition of their country; and while many of you will be spending hours and days examining trifling private claims, it seems that the great majority of the Members of our Legislature have reconciled themselves to the idea that they have nothing to do with international relations, that somewhere there is a great, wise man who will decide this question as to how this country shall conduct itself toward other countries of the world.

We have this peculiar situation: We have democracy so far as the geographical limits of the country are concerned, and we have the survival of monarchical traditions in our relations with other countries.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask whether under the rules governing Calendar Wednesday it is in order to talk about anything except the bill under consideration?

Mr. LONDON. I think the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that the debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not insist on the point of order, but I just want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman is proceeding by unanimous consent, and any gentleman can stop him who wishes to do so.

Mr. LONDON. I know you have been talking about a tariff on chestnuts during the discussion of the Post Office bill.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen who proceed by unanimous consent ought to preserve some semblance of courtesy.

Mr. LEVER. I was just about to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that I think I may be able to get up a bill which is not a chestnut and which does not relate to the tariff; and it seems to me the gentleman from New York might well reserve his speech until some time in general debate and not on Calendar Wednesday. I do not desire to object, but this speech is interfering very much with some legislation that I think means a great deal to his people and mine. The gentleman will have his opportunity later in general debate on appropriation bills, and I will agree to give him 30 minutes of my own time when the Agricultural bill comes up.

Mr. LONDON. I will get through in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, unless the gentleman from New York confines his remarks to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the objection comes too late?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules that point of order. Whenever the point is made the debate must be confined to the question under consideration.

Mr. LONDON. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven Members present—a quorum.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to detain the House for any length of time for the reason that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES], who is the leading minority member on the committee, has said that he sees no reason why this bill should not pass, and Judge WATKINS, chairman of the committee, has given excellent reasons why it should pass. Therefore I take it for granted that the bill will pass and receive practically the unanimous approval of the House. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 162. The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of any claim therefor filed within two years from and after January 1, 1917, of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any prior statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims."

SEC. 2. That all laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Now, I call attention to the report:

The Committee on Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8033) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that on page 1, lines 8 and 9, the words "the date of the passage of this bill" be stricken out, and the words "and after January 1, 1917," be inserted in lieu thereof, and the bill as thus amended do pass.

The purpose of this bill is to dispense with the allegation and proof of loyalty in those claims arising under section 162 of the act approved March 3, 1911, in which act provision is made for the repayment of the money paid into the United States Treasury as the proceeds of the property taken by the Federal authorities after June 1, 1865, under the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863.

It was evidently the intention of Congress to allow this money to be paid to the claimants from whom the property was taken after June 1, 1865 (after the cessation of hostilities), without the proof of loyalty; but as section 159 of the act approved March 3, 1911, requires such allegation and proof, a conflict of opinion has arisen as to the interpretation of the law upon this point, and it is to settle this question that this bill is presented.

As an act of simple justice it is right that the Government should repay this money, which has so long been held in the Treasury, arising from the proceeds of the sale of property taken from its owners after June 1, 1865, when the conflict between the people of the North and South had ended.

From the reading of the bill and report it is plain that the bill simply provides for giving the claimants opportunity to have refunded to them money from the sale of property subsequent to July 1, 1865, which was sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury of the United States. As a matter of fact, this is somewhat a legislative declaration of what the courts have held to be the law, but by reason of the fact that there has been some obscurity surrounding it it was thought best to make it a legislative enactment in order to remove any doubt upon that question.

The object and purpose of the bill is as I have stated. There is no denial of the principle that the funds affected by the bill are funds in the Treasury of the United States, held as a trust fund. It does not go to the general fund that belongs to the Government for the purpose of paying the ordinary and general debts of the Government, but is simply a fund deposited in the Treasury to be held by the Government to be paid to the owners of this property which was sold and the proceeds put into the Treasury of the United States.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], not to require proof of loyalty in this class of cases will give us an opportunity under this bill to demonstrate to the country that we all stand together upon this proposition; that, so far as the people are concerned, from whom the property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, when the unpleasant situation preceding that time had passed away, when there was no longer any reason why property should be taken or any reason why it should be sold or any special reason why it should go into the Treasury of the United States, but because there was a certain character of claim asserted to the property and it was therefore taken and sold and the money placed in the Treasury. When these conditions have ceased to exist at this late day it is as little as we can do to give these people an opportunity to go into the Court of Claims and by proving the fact that they owned the property at the time it was seized, that the property was actually sold and the expenses deducted from it, and that the net proceeds were placed in the Treasury of the United States and have remained there from that time to this, that when they have established their title and ownership of the property the Government should return it to them without requiring them to prove loyalty.

As was suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana on the opposite side of the Chamber, I can conceive of no reason or any objection that can be urged to the passage of this bill. It was their property and the proceeds is their money, and it is just and right to give them at least a chance in court to have it paid to them upon proper proof.

In addition to that, this bill, practically in the same words, in identically the same words, has twice been passed by this House. It went to the Senate of the United States, but by reason of the congested condition of the calendar the time went by and it was never reached and never considered. I take it for granted that if the House of Representatives, by a practically unanimous vote passes this bill again, making three times; that if it goes to the Senate of the United States for the third time it may possibly be reached, and after it is reached will receive the approval of that body and the approval of the President of the United States and become a law. I hope and trust that it may pass by unanimous vote; that we may all clasp hands together and stand together in this declaration to-day and say to the people throughout the United States wherever they live, no matter from what section of the country they come, that we give to you an opportunity to go into a court of justice, if your claim is in the class provided for in this bill, and establish your claim to the amount due you; and when that is done that judgment may be rendered in your favor, and that the Government of the United States will do justice to these people after all these years and pay them the amount justly due them.

Let us to-day stand beneath the sunshine of heaven in this beautiful country, and with kindness and admiration in our hearts for all patriotic Americans, do justice to the citizens of the Republic, whether they come from the North, South, East, or the West, and give them a right to go into a court of justice and recover that to which they are justly entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there were two gentlemen on this side who wished to be recognized, but, like the gentleman from New York, they did not desire to speak upon the subject of the bill. They deem it unnecessary to speak on this subject, because the sentiment seems to be practically unanimous, and therefore we will not take any more time on this side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what this bill will accomplish that is not now accomplished by existing law?

Mr. WATKINS. The law as it now stands says that in all cases arising before the Court of Claims they must allege and prove loyalty. The amnesty proclamation as construed in the Lincoln case overcomes that language according to a decision of the court, in which he says he did not think it was longer necessary in that class of cases to allege and prove loyalty. Still, in view of the fact that there is a contention in the court and exceptions are being filed on the ground that it is still necessary, we thought it better to do it in this way. But there is a broader reason, perhaps a sentimental one, and that is we feel that we would accomplish something if we should become involved in strife with another country, that it would be worth something to have a declaration of that kind embodied in the national law.

Mr. MANN. In other words, in order to get the support of the South we must pay them some money.

Mr. WATKINS. I repel that statement.

Mr. MANN. I repel the insinuation that the gentleman makes himself. He said there was a broader reason; in view of possible trouble we ought to do this for the South.

Mr. WATKINS. We mean that there should be a spirit of amity, a spirit of reconciliation that is not now recognized throughout the entire country, and the approval of it should be recognized.

Mr. MANN. A spirit of amity accompanied by a payment of money every time.

Mr. WATKINS. No; no.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the South can afford to have its Representatives make such statements on the floor.

Mr. WATKINS. As far as the payment of the money is concerned, the courts have already decided it was not necessary.

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition; but when gentlemen say that they want this bill passed, with the design to get money from the Treasury, perhaps properly, in order that the Government may have the good will of the South if we have trouble with some other country, I think it is an insult to the South, and especially for a Representative from the South to make such a statement.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will pardon me for this interruption, and I hope that he will allow me the opportunity of stating in this connection that that was not my intention, that it was not my declaration; but it was to show amity of feeling, consideration, conciliation on the part of the northern section of the country, and not because it would accomplish anything on the part of the South.

Mr. MANN. The northern part of the country does not need any conciliation if we have trouble, but the gentleman repeats it again. It seems impossible for him to understand his own position. His statement was that in view of the possibility of trouble with some other nation, in order that we might have the solid support of the South we must pass a bill granting them money. Great heavens! Have we come to such a pass that we must put through any kind of a bill in order to get that? Does the gentleman say that seriously? The South does not need that. If that is the only excuse he has for this bill, there is no excuse for it at all. As I understand, the only excuse for the bill at all is that the Court of Claims has rendered an opinion which might be reversed in the higher court and the gentleman desires to put into the law in language what the Court of Claims says is now in the law. Is that correct?

Mr. WATKINS. No; it is not stated in the law. It is only there by inference, and the judge who rendered that decision is no longer upon the bench.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference whether it is stated in the law or by inference.

Mr. WATKINS. It is not in the law. It is only the expression of an opinion by a judge who is no longer upon the bench.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is good law?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Was it a mere expression of opinion or a judgment?

Mr. WATKINS. My opinion would have been, preceding the action of Congress only a few moments ago, that it was good law, but there is now a declaration on the part of the House of Representatives that the allegation and proof of loyalty is necessary in the class of claims arising from captured and abandoned property.

Mr. MANN. That is the class of claims covered by the bill that was passed.

Mr. WATKINS. That refers to the same class of property.

Mr. MANN. My understanding is that the Court of Claims rendered a judgment in which the court held that proof of loyalty in these cases covered by section 162 of the Judicial Code was not necessary; that that judgment now stands unreversed in the Court of Claims. It may be that at some future time some one would take a similar case to the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Court would decide to the contrary, although all of the gentlemen who argued for the prior bill insisted that the Supreme Court itself had decided the same way. I do not know that I can have any objection to this bill, but I do think that when we bring in bills to declare the law what the courts declare it we are wasting a good deal of valuable time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 162. The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of any claim therefor filed within two years from the date of the passage of this bill of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any prior statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, lines 8 and 9, strike out "the date of the passage of this bill" and insert "and after January 1, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "claims," strike out "any prior statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding," and insert "if they be filed within the time limited. Any balance of said net proceeds remaining in the Treasury of the United States, not claimed within the said period so limited, shall, after the adjudication of all then pending claims and the full payment of all sums recovered by claimants, and accrued interest thereon, revert to and become the property of the United States."

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the committee of which I am a member this amendment was considered, but the committee did not adopt it. I believe it should be adopted in the interest of having a final settlement of this matter; that after the claims presented under this act have been paid, after the two years have expired, the balance of the money remaining in the Treasury not then claimed, the claims having been filed and adjudicated, should be returned to the Treasury of the United States, to revert to and become the property of the United States. This is in the interest of having this matter finally disposed of and not having it come up in succeeding Congresses to annoy other committees and Members of this House at a later time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to pay interest upon these claims?

Mr. WATKINS. No.

Mr. MANN. I did not ask the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WATKINS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. He was looking directly at me.

Mr. HOPWOOD. There was no intention to pay interest upon them.

Mr. MANN. Then why put in that provision?

Mr. HOPWOOD. I did not put that in when I wrote the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it could get in unless somebody put it in.

Mr. HOPWOOD. The idea was to pay the claims as then presented, as the court adjudicated, and I will ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "and accrued interest thereon."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to strike out the words "and accrued interest thereon." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPWOOD. With this end in view I made this amendment.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPWOOD. I will.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what the purpose of it is? Does this represent unclaimed money to be paid back to the Treasury of the United States to forestall subsequent claimants?

Mr. HOPWOOD. It is merely to give them their day in court, which will be two years in which to present their claims. If they do not present their claims finally within that time, we ask that that money be turned over to the United States Treasury, and that forever shuts them out after two years.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I had the idea that the gentleman's amendment dealt with the problem of money awarded and that there would be some dispute as to who was entitled to it, and this money was forfeited in the Treasury to bar claimants.

Mr. HOPWOOD. No; we want the money paid that will be claimed within the two years.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I see.

Mr. HOPWOOD. And after that is done we want this matter finally settled and tne remainder of the fund, if there be a remainder, turned into the Treasury and these parties forever barred from claiming thereafter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOPWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In view of the statement which the gentleman made in reference to interest, I will ask the gentleman if he prepared this amendment himself?

Mr. HOPWOOD. I did prepare it; yes, sir. I wrote it out in lead pencil.

Mr. MANN. Somebody must have taken undue liberties with it when it was typewritten when they have inserted a provision providing for interest on claims that are 50 years old.

Mr. HOPWOOD. How that got in I do not know, but I ask that it be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. It was stricken out by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I was trying to find out the origin of such a proposition to see whether the gentleman might not be misled on something else in the amendment.

Mr. HOPWOOD. I think that meets the approbation at least of the minority of the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to state that this question was brought up in the committee while we had the bill under consideration and it is not a committee amendment, and although it comes as an amendment from the committee, it was not agreed upon by the committee. The inference seems to be that it is a committee amendment, but it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is opposed to this amendment?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; in view of the situation. It has not been thoroughly and fully discussed, and I would go with the committee on the amendment—that is, I would not support it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It seems to me that the amendment is to make effective finally the statute of limitation. After 50 years, two years more even being given, let it then be finally disposed of and the door closed. If this money remains in the Treasury to the credit of citizens whose property was taken there will always be an inducement and encouragement to some one to introduce a bill here and demand a law to extend further and extend again the statute of limitation. Now, this bill is urged—the gentleman from Louisiana and his committee urge upon Congress this bill to extend the statute of limitation and give further opportunity for claimants to present their claims, with the idea that then and thereby the entire matter will be finally settled; but evidently the gentleman and his committee are not willing to have it finally settled, because in years to come and just as long as the money remains in the Treasury to the credit of claimants there will be the old and familiar talk about a "trust fund," and some one will be found to introduce a bill further extending the privilege of asking for the money. It seems to me that if this bill as presented is on the right theory and if gentlemen are sincerely in hope of closing this matter finally, the best and the only way is to give these claimants such opportunity as this bill offers to present their claims and then close the door and keep it closed and turn the money into the general fund of the Treasury and let all this matter of war claims be disposed of. It seems to me the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the gentleman is very forceful, and ordinarily would seem to be conclusive; but when we regard the fact that it is a trust fund and the proceeds of property which was taken from these people with the understanding that it should be put in the Treasury, the identical proceeds of the property which was taken to be put there as a trust fund, there are some distinctive features between that and an ordinary fund. The committee had not thoroughly digested and argued the question and did not feel disposed to accept the amendment on the part of the committee. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the question was raised in the committee and we thought pretty thoroughly discussed. Perhaps the gentleman on the other side does not remember this as well as I do. I proposed this matter in the committee, and after we found that it was somewhat objectionable to the majority of the committee we went along with the bill, believing that the bill in its main provisions was all right and ought to be passed and become the law. To give to these people who had had their money withheld from them for 50 years, money that they can prove should come to them, and if we open the doors for two years to them to make proof of these claims or enter claims—they do not have to prove them in the two years—but if they begin their suit or enter their claims within the two years, then, after those claims are adjudicated, my amendment goes to the effect that after their adjudication and money obtained thereunder, that then the remainder of the money is turned into the United States Treasury and the doors are closed.

Now, I think that is all these people ought to ask, and I think they ought to agree to the amendment. I think the amendment is in the interest of giving those who are entitled to it their money and giving them all the chance in the world to make their claims good, and after they have had their day in court to close this door and stop further trouble for Congress over this matter.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HOPWOOD. I do.

Mr. HARDY. If an ordinary trustee, what the gentleman says, owing to the course of human events, would be very forcible, but does it not seem just a little out of place for the Government of the United States, holding a trust fund to which it lays no claim of ownership, to refuse to pay the just claim of anyone whatsoever? In other words, many of our people, scattered over this country, do not always read the newspapers and keep up to date with the pushing of their claims. It would be different from any condition I have ever known if in two years everybody who had rights under this law should be informed of them. It is altogether possible that many people may not within the two years' time learn of their rights and push them. Now, because they are not diligent they should not be debarred from this privilege. It may be a married woman, it may be an infant. A thousand things may come up to excuse delay or excuse the want of that diligence which is generally considered essential, and why should the Government of the United States want to close the door against a just claim?

Now, it seems to me that in equity the great Government of the United States does not really want to close the door against a just claim, and that is the reason, it seems to me, this amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARDY. Surely.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Then why do you put this two-year provision in the bill at all?

Mr. HARDY. I am not familiar with the bill. I am talking of an amendment that wants forever to close the doors of justice on a claimant.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. You feel that some of these infant industries, these claim agents here in Washington, will lose their day in court?

Mr. HARDY. I want you to put him out of the way, but I do not want to close the doors of justice against an honest claimant who has been negligent.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does not the gentleman think, then, that we ought to strike out the two-year feature altogether?

Mr. HARDY. I am only speaking of the amendment. I am not prepared to discuss the bill. I have paid no attention to it. But it occurred to me that the United States did not want to finally close the doors.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in answer I desire to say I ordinarily do not favor a limitation against claims; but as 50 years have passed, and I have no doubt that all the claimants that will come in under this act, if passed, have developed their claims and had them in the hands of lawyers, probably, and have been waiting for something like this to give them an opportunity to reenter the door and present their claims and secure an adjudication of them, I have no idea at all but that every claim that can be made good will be presented within the two years. And it seems to me that after this long term of years two additional years ought to be sufficient to allow every claimant to get in. Of course it would be a hardship, as the gentleman says——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit just another interruption?

Mr. HOPWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me the gentleman has stated a very good reason for not closing them. In all human probabilities every meritorious claim will be presented, but it is more than possible that some meritorious claims may not find their way into court. Some parties, ignorant of their rights, may sleep on them, and certainly it seems to me the great Government of the United States does not want to punish them.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman does not seem to be aware that this bill, irrespective of this amendment, does that very thing.

Mr. HARDY. I have not the floor.

Mr. HOPWOOD. The bill, irrespective of the amendment, closes the door after two years.

Mr. MANN. Not in the opinion of the court or the Treasury Department, I will say to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPWOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It is a new section.

Mr. STAFFORD. A new section following section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the amendment offered by the gentleman go?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It follows section 1, to be known as section 2 if adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, at the end of section 1, insert:

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 20 per cent of the amount recovered for services rendered, and any contract executed after the passage of this act providing for compensation in any sum exceeding 20 per cent shall be void. Any person violating the provisions of this section by exacting, collecting, withholding, or receiving any sum in excess of said 20 per cent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this is identically word for word the amendment put on the other bill to-day and upon a claim bill adopted last Wednesday. It ought, if the House is to be consistent, to be put upon this bill.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I do.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Does it provide "in all contracts made"?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It is word for word in accordance with the one we adopted here to-day and the one adopted last Wednesday.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Is the word "hereafter" in it?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It is exactly like the other. Let it be again reported, if the gentleman has any doubts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a new section, to follow immediately the section just inserted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOWARD: On page 2, after the section just adopted, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to furnish to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, within 60 days of the passage of this act, a list of all persons who are entitled to any sum under the provisions of this act, together with the names of claimants, the place of residence, and the amount due by the Government to each person aforesaid."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I will ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order for just one moment, if he will.

Mr. MANN. I will be very glad to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is quite simple. There are a great many of these claims that ought to be paid. They are now in the hands of a great many people who know nothing in the world about legislative procedure, and in a great many instances the fact that these bills have passed for their relief will be overlooked. This is an absolutely fair proposition. It is 50 years since the war, and a great many of these original claimants are dead, and their children are entitled to recover this money from the Government of the United States.

Now, it will keep down a multiplicity of claims that will be filed and that will have no merit in them, and it will save a great deal of time; and if the Government really owes this money, there is no secret about it, and under the present ruling of the Treasury Department this information is not ascertainable. I can see no logical reason why this information should not be given to the House in order that it may be published as a House document and to the Senate in order that it may be published as a Senate document, so that when we get inquiries by the hundreds, as you gentlemen on the other side get inquiries by the thousands about pensions—and we will commence to get them about claims as soon as these bills are passed—it will expedite the filing of these claims and the real meritorious claims will at once reach the Court of Claims. There is not any reason in the world why there should be any secrecy about the persons to whom the Government owes this money, and there should at least be no reluctance on the part of the Government to give information about an honest claim against the Government.

This Government, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, is able to pay these claims. It is honest enough to pay them, and it is of no use for this House to vote to keep the honest claimant of this country from knowing what is due him and where the property was confiscated and why. There are a million people in the South from which this property was taken, and there is no reason why they should be kept in darkness and ignorance when we could, if this amendment were adopted, send them a House document and show them whether or not they are entitled to anything under this bill.

It is in the interest of the expedition of business that I have introduced this amendment, and I hope that my great and good and lovable friend—under certain circumstances the most lovable man in the House—will withhold his objection to this amendment. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, my good friend from Georgia is somewhat mistaken as to the facts. He desires to have the Secretary of the Treasury report here the owners of this property when taken. The Secretary of the Treasury does not know. There are claims pending for many millions of dollars where the amount involved is very much larger than the amount in the Treasury. There are many claimants for the same cotton in nearly every case which has not already been disposed of. In the opinion of the Treasury Department the cotton belonged to the Confederate Government, so that any information which could be furnished to the House by the Treasury Department would be of no practical benefit to the claimants. It might possibly be of some benefit to the claim attorneys, but it would be a very exhaustive thing to make this examination and report upon claims which the Treasury Department would only report were not owned by the people entitled to be recompensed or that a number of people claimed the same property.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will remember, probably in the Fifty-ninth or Sixtieth Congress, there was such a document printed, in part, as a Senate document.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. That did give the number of bales of cotton confiscated, the month in which it was confiscated, by whom it was confiscated, and to whom it belonged. Now, I understand that most of these claims have already been heard or passed upon by the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. Doubtless the Secretary of the Treasury at that time made a report of everything which he could make a report upon. Now, the gentleman from Georgia wants the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report upon matters about which he has no information and can not determine. It is not the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, if this bill passes, to determine who were the owners of the property taken. That duty is confided to the courts. I do not know of any reason why the Government should advertise to men that they have a claim against the Government. If the Government took property belonging to people during the war and those people did not know it, the chances are they did not own the property.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, my recollection is that the document to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has referred was a reprint of a report made in the Forty-ninth Congress. I am not certain that I am correct about that, but it was simply a reprint of what the record showed at that time.

Mr. MANN. The record showed at that time all the information the Treasury Department had.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; and all that it has now.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. And if it is a matter of getting the document I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that we have that document reprinted.

Mr. HARRISON. If the gentleman will permit me, I once had a copy of this document. My recollection is that it was a reprint of certain claims that were presented, but not passed upon, in the old Claims Commission, created, I think, in 1870 or 1871. This print has been exhausted and is no longer available. I know that, because I tried to get one of them to-day, with this amendment in view, but could not get it.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is—and I may be mistaken about it—that at one time I asked the Treasury Department in reference to these claims, and was told that it was practically impossible to make a very satisfactory statement, and that to make any kind of a statement would be very expensive. I think we ought to have more information about it. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WATKINS. So that gentlemen on both sides may understand, I will say that this amendment has been substantially complied with by the reprint of Senate Document 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, so there is really no necessity for the amendment. I hope gentlemen will understand that. The document has already been reprinted in that way.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee, I withdraw my amendment; or the Chair can very properly sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I move that this section be renumbered section 3.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that that is not necessary. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring what is the necessity for this section. It is very seldom that we carry anything of this kind. What would it repeal? A repeal by implication is carried by the passage of the new act.

Mr. WATKINS. That is very true.

Mr. MANN. This does not repeal anything specifically. What is the use of cumbering up the statutes with so many provisions?

Mr. WATKINS. We have many statutes on the same subject matter. Two different laws on the same subject were passed in 1863, and there have been a great many amendments to them. This does no harm, and it is safer to have it in the law.

Mr. MANN. I can not see how it is safer to have it in the law. Here is a bill amending a certain section of the judicial code which has been in force for some time. That is the law. It is not proposed to repeal that. Now, you say—

That all laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The general statutes, to the extent that they are in conflict with the act, are repealed by its passage. We ought not to repeal by implication, except so far as the repeal is carried by the new law. I do not know what might be repealed. There may be 40 acts relating to the subject which would not be affected by this act at all.

Mr. WATKINS. The only change would be in the time limit, and we thought it better to put that in.

Mr. MANN. But you carry the time limit in this bill. You have provided for that.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think it is necessary to have this section stricken out, and it certainly does no harm.

Mr. MANN. I think it does harm. It is like the provision which is sometimes added to a bill that this act shall take effect immediately upon its passage. It simply cumbers up the statute books.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It is not needed, but it does no harm.

Mr. MANN. Nobody knows whether it does harm or not. This says:

That all laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

It does not even say to the extent that they are in conflict with this act. They would be repealed to the extent that they are in conflict with this act. We have adopted for years the practice of not putting this section in bills. I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last section.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8033) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WATKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CODIFICATION OF LAWS RELATING TO COMMON CARRIERS.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12420) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to common carriers of interstate and foreign commerce, and within the District of Columbia, and combinations in restraint of trade. Mr. Speaker, if we can have any kind of an understanding as to the utilization of time for another purpose, I would like to make a request, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will enter into an agreement by which we can save the time.

Mr. MANN. We might as well read the bill now as at any other time.

Mr. WATKINS. Of course it is impossible to complete the bill during this Wednesday and the next Calendar Wednesday, and it is the purpose of the committee to procure a rule for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am informed that the bill makes a lot of changes in relation to safety appliances for railroads, provisions that we worked upon for years, that are entirely unjustifiable and which no codification committee ought to have made, and I am not going to allow the bill to be considered if I can help it.

Mr. WATKINS. Does the gentleman object to my unanimous request?

Mr. MANN. I have heard no unanimous request yet.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, at the time I was interrupted I intended to make a request for unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice until next Wednesday, and in the meantime we will procure a rule and save time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 12420.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. Is it in order at this time to raise the question of consideration on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Will the committee consider the bill H. R. 12420?

The question was taken, and the committee refused to consider the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from South Carolina moved that the committee dispense with the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. No; he raised the question of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has refused to consider it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report to the House that the committee has refused to consider the bill H. R. 12420.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCGILLICUDDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had directed him to report that it had refused to consider the bill H. R. 12420.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consider the question as to whether or not the bill H. R. 12420——

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will indorse the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union not to consider the bill at the present time.

The question was taken, and the action of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do both at the same time. Which does he want the Chair to do, to find out whether there is a quorum present or to put the question as to the yeas and nays?

Mr. WATKINS. If there is a quorum, I want the yeas and nays. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the yeas and nays or does he make the point of no quorum?

Mr. WATKINS. I rather think, Mr. Speaker, that there may be a quorum, and so I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Four Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. WATKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, on the question of whether the House will ratify the action of the Committee of the Whole House, I claim that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That point is too late. The gentleman can make a point of no quorum, and if he makes it the Chair will count. Has the gentleman from Louisiana any more business to bring before the committee?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit me a statement, I do not desire to stand in the way of important business of the Committee on Agriculture, but in view of the fact that we have called up for consideration the bill which I presented, and believing that by next Wednesday I will be enabled to get the bill in such shape as to present it to the House, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee on Revision of the Laws has no more business, the Clerk will call the next committee.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have none that I care to call up at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS UNDER THE RECLAMATION ACT.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, I call up the bill H. R. 384, to amend the act of June 23, 1910, entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within the reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act."

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 384, with Mr. KEATING in the chair.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object. This is a very short bill, and I think it ought to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 23, 1910 (Public, 243, 36 Stat., p. 592), entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act," is hereby amended by adding the following proviso: "Provided, That any assignment made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1913, of which the assignor has submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignee purchased with the belief that the assignment was valid and under the act of June 23, 1910, are hereby confirmed, and the assignee shall be entitled to the land assigned as under the act of June 23, 1910, notwithstanding that said original entry was conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from said entry prior to the date of assignment and prior to the date of final proof: Provided further, That such assignee shall in other respects comply with all of the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in the original reclamation act, as well as the general act in regard to homesteads in desert claims, except in a few instances, no assignment was permitted to be made prior to patent. In other words, a man could not sell part of his homestead claim prior to the issuance of the final certificate by the register and receiver. The reclamation act of June 23, 1910 (36 Stats., 592), provides:

That from and after the filing with the Commissioner of the General Land Office of satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for the five years required by law persons who have or shall make homestead entries within reclamation projects under the provision of the act of June 17, 1902, may assign such entries or any part thereof to other persons, and such assignees, upon submitting proof of the reclamation of the lands and upon payment of the charges apportioned against the same, as provided in the said act of June 17, 1902, may receive from the United States a patent for the lands: Provided, That all assignments made under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any possibility of any person being defrauded of any indebtedness that may exist by the assignment of so-called rights of the patent before the homesteader gets his patent to some one else, to whom the patent may be issued afterwards?

Mr. RAKER. No. This has worked well under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910. In other words, a man had a claim for 160 acres. It was then put into a unit or classified, and in that project he might not be able to hold more than 40 acres or 80 acres, and after he had made his proof, and it is thus classified, he would lose the balance of his homestead entry, and this act of June 23, 1910, was a remedial act giving him the privilege of selling to some other qualified settler the other 80 acres, and the assignee then had to comply with the reclamation of the land and pay the charges and rentals under all of the limitations provided for in the act of June 17, 1902, under the reclamation project. That, then, did not deprive a man of his rights acquired under the original filing, but gave his assignee a chance to go on and complete the portion sold, and, upon compliance with the law, in due course, to obtain his patent to the portion assigned, whatever that might be.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose the assignor owed a lot of money, which the person to whom he owed it was not able to collect?

Mr. RAKER. This is the very purpose of that. He would have lost the remaining tract of his land if it had not been for the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910.

Mr. MADDEN. What becomes of the man who may have trusted the assignor?

Mr. RAKER. He has but a personal credit. He has no lien against the land; he could not get any lien against the land before final certificate issued.

Mr. MADDEN. But if final certificate did issue, the person to whom the patent was granted originally would have something against which a judgment could be rendered.

Mr. RAKER. On the reclamation projects he would not.

Mr. MADDEN. After the patent issued, he could.

Mr. RAKER. But patents were not permitted to be issued under the conditions in the reclamation project when the Reclamation Service had classified it into units, known as homestead units, and if it classified it into units of 80 acres, of course no final certificate would issue for the other 80 acres and no patent would issue to the original homestead entryman except for the amount of the farm unit. Therefore, the man had nothing upon which he could pledge any credit.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me put this question to the gentleman from California. Suppose he was an original homestead entryman.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And I was a banker.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And in the course of his work of development of the entry he had borrowed money from me, and he made a transfer of this land to somebody else before title was issued to him and received in consideration for that assignment $5,000. He puts that $5,000 in his pocket. As a creditor of the gentleman, I have no recourse against the money he has in his pocket, whereas if the title of the land came to him, as it eventually would come to him if he had not made an assignment, he would have had something against which a judgment would lie in the event he has refused to make payment to me.

Mr. RAKER. One thing before I answer the question of the gentleman. I wish the gentleman would take some other illustration as to A or B, because there is no danger of my being in a condition to borrow $5,000. Now, I will answer the gentleman's illustration by saying that the suggestion presented by the gentleman could not occur in the reclamation of homesteads, because he files under the law that the homestead would be reduced according to the determination by the Secretary of the Interior of what should constitute a farm unit, and no certificate was ever issued and no patent issued until the Secretary of the Interior had decreed what should be the farm unit.

Now, when the Secretary of the Interior has decreed that the farm unit should be 40 acres, all he could ever obtain would be 40 acres and the other 120 acres would be turned back to the Government as public land. Now, the act of June 23, 1910, to cover the very purpose which the gentleman from Illinois suggests, permitted a man, after a homestead had been thus classified, to sell the other 120 acres to get something back for the expenses that he had been put to and, probably, to meet the very kind and character of claim as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that after the land had been conformed the law permits the entryman to sell that part of the claim which was eliminated from his entry by that conformation?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; that is the purpose of the act of June 23, 1910. After he had made final proof and payment, and then when the land was conformed he could sell the remaining part of the land over and above the farm unit. It might be 80 acres, and he would get the benefit of the sale of that tract of land to some other party, who must in turn complete the reclamation of it and at the same time pay all the charges as to maintenance and upkeep, as well as the construction of irrigation works upon the project.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield with pleasure to the gentleman, a member of the committee.

Mr. KINKAID. I wish to explain to the gentleman from Minnesota that the especial purpose for which this is asked is that the Government allows these entrymen to enter, as it were, 160 acres, and subsequently—if the gentleman will permit me to complete the explanation—the farm unit is reduced to 80 acres. Meanwhile the entryman has gone on and complied with the law in every particular whereby he would become entitled to a patent to the full 160 acres except for the fact that finally the department concludes to make a farm unit of 80 acres, so that equitably he has become entitled to this land. Now, the department adopted the statute which was passed which has not proven effective in all cases, and this bill seeks to afford relief for those cases which the act did not cover and provide fully for the few cases, a very few, and the cases in the future. It is entirely equitable and he is entitled to this land. He has earned the land except paying the construction charges completely, and they will have to be paid by the purchaser.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understood the gentleman from California to say that at the time he made his filing it was understood that his entry might be reduced and conformed to a smaller area than 160 acres. If that is true, I do not see that he has any equity at all.

Mr. KINKAID. That was under the old law, where the farm unit was not fixed at the start. It is a practice that the department does not now follow. The law has changed it, and now they can not make the entry until the farm unit has been determined and the public given notice of the fact. But the Government itself was a party to this mistake and complication in the first instance, and thereby the equities grew up in favor of the entryman. The farm unit—the homestead unit—as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] well knows, is 160 acres, and in many places 140 acres was allowed. In places the 160-acre farm unit was allowed under the reclamation law, and in most instances a farm unit of 160 acres would be allowed under the reclamation law when first made. Five years in some instances was the time to acquire a patent under the homestead law—the old law—but changed to three years now by amendment, and they complied with the law before reduction.

Mr. RAKER. Carrying out your statement further, after a man had made final proof and had been on the land five years, and until the Secretary of the Interior had conformed it to the farm unit, it might run on 10 years more, and still, when it was conformed to a farm unit, if it was not for this act of June 23, 1910, and he conformed to the farm unit of 40 acres, the man would lose 120 acres he had given his time and attention to.

Mr. KINKAID. That is entirely correct.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose that the day after the entry had been made the department had conformed to the farm unit, say, 80 acres, what equity would the entryman have then to be recognized by us to part with the 80 acres he would not receive under the unit?

Mr. RAKER. Under the act of June 23, 1910, or this bill, he would not get any relief. There is no question about that. He must have made final proof of residence and cultivation before the conformation was made.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the gentleman, then, in order to make final proof under the reclamation homestead, how much cultivation was required?

Mr. RAKER. The same as the ordinary homestead.

Mr. LENROOT. He would not need to cultivate the entire entry?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. So that final proof on the part he would be entitled to would also be sufficient proof upon the larger area if he had it all cultivated?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. So that his final proof would be the same whether he made a claim to 80 acres or 120 acres?

Mr. RAKER. Or 40.

Mr. LENROOT. Or 40.

Mr. RAKER. Just the same.

Mr. LENROOT. So what equity would there be if the conformation was made shortly after?

Mr. RAKER. He would get it under the act of June 23, 1910. It says that from and after the filing with the commission in the General Land Office of satisfactory proof, residence, and cultivation. That had to be a five-year limit under the act as it then stood. If he had resided on the place five years, after he had cultivated it five years, and improved it five years, and made application to make final proof, and then it was conformed to the farm unit, he could sell that over and above the farm unit.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose on June 1, 1910, an entry was made for 160 acres and on June 2 the farm unit was conformed to 120 acres?

Mr. RAKER. He could not comply with the law.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, let us see whether under the terms of your bill he could or not. On June 24 he had sold or assigned the 40 acres that he could not receive under the farm unit; would not this bill protect that sale?

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, why not?

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not think it would. The only difference between this bill and the act of June 23, 1910, is that the man thought he had the right to sell after he had made his final proof or even before it was conformed to the farm unit, and he sold. The party bought in good faith and paid his money. Now, there are a number of cases—not many—that are thus situated, and under the act as it stands, having complied with all the provisions of the act specified, they would not be able to give the assignee a clear title.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the general homestead law a man is not entitled to sell at all prior to his final proof and his earning of the equitable title to the land.

Mr. RAKER. That is the same as in these cases.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Suppose prior to final proof a man had undertaken to sell his entry. Does not this bill before us now protect the title to his purchaser?

Mr. RAKER. This statute is remedial. It provides that a person should reside on the land and improve and cultivate it for a period of five years, only to have it cut down without compensation. That obviously would not be right. Now, the object of the act of June 23, 1910, was to permit persons who had made satisfactory proof of five years' residence and cultivation to assign part of their entries and particularly to assign the portion of their entries which was cut down. That was the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. But this bill permits them to sell prior to final proof, or, rather, validates the sale if it is made prior to the final proof.

Mr. RAKER. In case the entryman made the sale, believing that he was conforming to the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. How could he believe it, when the law did not permit it?

Mr. RAKER. It was understood. In the actual administration the same hardship would work against those making five-year proof of cultivation and residence and improvement, who just before proof had had their entries cut down and were unable under the law to assign. Now, the farm unit was made just before final proof. The party made his final proof application of five years' residence and cultivation and improvement, but without his knowledge the farm unit was made before, and therefore, having been made before the final proof, it was held that he could not make the assignment. Now, there can be no more injustice in permitting the man who has given the actual five years' residence and cultivation and improvement to make the assignment conforming to the farm unit than there would be to permit one to make the assignment even after final proof, but after the land has been made to conform to the farm unit.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. The purpose of the homestead law, as I understand it, is to enable the people to get homes.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. To live on the land and settle on it?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. And in accordance with that policy, settlers have not been permitted by the General Land Office to make assignments prior to final proof?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. This bill validates assignments which were made prior to the final proof. Now, if it is the policy of the gentleman and of the department to permit homesteaders to sell a part of their homestead entries, instead of making homes on them, that is one proposition; but if it is not, that is another.

Mr. RAKER. Well, the gentleman realizes that the purpose of the act is remedial of the general reclamation act, namely, the act of June 23, 1910. That was for the purpose of permitting sales of land—40, 80, 120 acres—and in some projects the farm unit was only 20 acres.

Mr. ANDERSON. Where final proof had been made.

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Now, the assignee under this remedial statute——

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman from California was going to quit at 5 o'clock?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the lack of a quorum.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his suggestion.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw it temporarily.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER as Speaker pro tempore having assumed the chair, Mr. KEATING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 384, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 2, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Hollis	Myers	Shields
Husting	Nelson	Simmons
James	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is absent on committee work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I take the floor on the pending bill, but not to discuss it. I interrupt the progress of the unfinished business to make a brief statement, and then to make a suggestion with respect to what is known as the Gore resolution and other resolutions of like nature.

I desire to state the international situation, as I understand it, respecting the immediate questions before us. A sharp issue has been joined between Germany and Great Britain as to the status of armed merchant vessels. Germany contends that armed belligerent vessels are in all essential respects the equivalent of auxiliary or converted cruisers, and that they should be treated as war vessels. That Government has announced their policy to be that after the 1st day of the present month armed enemy vessels of all kinds would be regarded as warships and be subject to the rules of maritime warfare applicable to such ships. On the other hand, Great Britain contends that she has a right under international law to arm merchant ships for defensive purposes, and that merchant vessels so armed are entitled to the same immunities in every respect appertaining to unarmed merchantmen, and this without regard to the kind of passengers aboard or the nature of the cargoes carried. Great Britain has announced this to be her policy. That is the issue between these two Governments on that question.

Now, where and how does the Government of the United States come into this controversy? I answer in this way: That if both Germany and Great Britain shall persist in the course they have respectively announced, neither yielding to the other, nor yet yielding to the importunities of any neutral Government, including our own, and if Germany should attack without warning an armed merchantman of her enemy and some American citizen or citizens should be injured, the question would present itself as to what our attitude and course should be in the circumstances. If no American should be aboard a ship so attacked, and therefore if none suffered, we would have no cause to break into and take up a cudgel in that quarrel, unless, indeed, we should proceed upon some altruistic theory of an obligation to humanity in general.

Mr. President, this brings me to a point which greatly distresses me. Nevertheless, I feel obligated to state the case as I understand it to be.

To my mind, in this exigency, it is of the highest importance that Senators, Representatives, and the President—all alike—should speak to each other and to the country with the utmost candor and frankness, free from disingenuousness. We should wear our hearts, so to speak, upon our sleeves, not for daws to peck at, but that we may know exactly how men in positions of responsibility feel and think. As I understand it, the President's attitude is this: That he has concluded to support the contention that belligerent merchant ships have a right under international law to bear arms for defensive purposes. What he may regard as a defensive armament I do not know; in fact, I doubt that any man would venture authoritatively to define that kind of armament. Furthermore, if a German war vessel should, without warning, fire upon and sink an armed merchantman of the enemy, he would hold the attack to be a lawless act, and if American citizens should suffer therefrom he would hold the German Government to the strictest account. If, notwithstanding, the German Government should persist in their policy he would sever diplomatic relations and submit the matter to Congress, which under the Constitution is the war-making power.

I must here state with equal frankness my own position, as I have stated it to the President. In this emergency there should be nothing of evasion or finesse, much less of partisanship. Distressing as it is to me to be obliged to disagree with the President, as well as with many of my colleagues, my opinions have been matured after great deliberation and my sense of duty is imperative. I can not but believe that a belligerent merchant ship, heavily armed—no matter whether it be called defensive or offensive armament—engaged in transporting contraband war material to the army or navy of her sovereign, is in all essential respects the equivalent of a duly commissioned war vessel. To say the least, I think there can be no manner of doubt that the law now covering that question is involved in doubt and may well be considered as debatable. I shall not discuss that question at this time; I am merely stating my position, and what I know to be the position of numerous others. I shall feel obliged as a duty to myself, my constituency, and the country to discuss this question at length in the immediate future with a view to elaborating the reasons upon which my convictions are predicated.

The President is firmly opposed to the idea embodied in the Gore resolution. He is not only opposed to Congress passing a law relating to this subject, but he is opposed to any form of official warning to American citizens to keep off so-called armed merchantmen. If I could have my way, which I know I can not, I would take some definite step—a step as far as the Constitution would permit—to save this country from becoming embroiled in this European war through the recklessness of foolhardy men.

Mr. President, I think this is a fair statement of the situation as it is to-day.

The President has written Representative POU, and he has stated to me and to others that the pendency of these resolutions in Congress has been and still is a source of embarrassment to him in conducting diplomatic negotiations with the belligerent powers involved respecting this subject. I am sure that is so, and it is regrettable. As you well know, Senators, I have diligently sought to prevent the introduction of any resolutions on this subject and to allay any agitation with regard to it; but the efforts I have made with others in this behalf have been only partially successful. Now, we are informed by the President that he is solicitous that these resolutions should be disposed of in both Houses, and that the attitude of Congress should be more clearly defined. I am in full sympathy with him as to that, and I will cooperate to bring that matter to a head. The difficulty is in arranging a plan that would be effective and of value. I am more than willing to contribute anything within my power in arranging a plan of action with the sincere purpose of bringing the executive and legislative departments into accord. It may be, and I profoundly hope it is so, that the President, having behind him the support of Congress, may even yet be able to bring Great Britain and Germany to some agreement with this Government which would relieve the present acute situation. I am now puzzling my brain to frame a resolution as a supplement for all other pending resolutions on the subject; and as I get it into the best form of which I am capable, I desire to discuss the resolution with Senators on both sides, with the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and also, if need be, with others. I desire to bring the Congress with practical unanimity to the support of the President in the conduct of the diplomatic questions involved. Of course, time is now of the essence of things, and prompt action is desirable. My suggestion is this: That the Senate shall strive with the utmost diligence to dispose of the unfinished business to-day; but whether it succeeds in disposing of that business or not, I shall at the close of to-day's business ask the Senate to adjourn until some early hour to-morrow morning, at which time the Gore resolution shall be laid before the Senate.

Mr. President, although it is my earnest desire to cooperate with Senators who coincide with the President's attitude concerning this whole subject, yet, because of the fact I am not in accord with the President on the main issues, it would be entirely agreeable to me if any of the Senators indicated should take another course if they so desire. If the Senate agrees to the suggestion I have made, I will proceed in my effort to discover a plan to which we may all agree; but if another course should be taken, I can only abide the result. That is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have listened, as I am sure every other Senator has listened, with profound interest to what has been said by the Senator from Missouri, and I am certain that we all appreciate the gravity of the situation to which he has called the attention of the Senate. I agree entirely with him, Mr. President, that this is not a party question. I agree also with him that our first duty under existing conditions is to dispose of the precise question that has been raised by the resolution to which he has referred. I think it is more important than any unfinished business.

One mistake, I think, the Senator has made. When he says that this question is confined to an issue between Great Britain and Germany, I wish to say that every Italian ship that comes into our port of New York is armed; every French merchantman is carrying a defensive armament, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will permit me to interrupt him. I did say exactly what he has stated, but I was not unconscious, of course, that other powers are involved. I said what I did, however, on the theory that the diplomatic situation was being mainly conducted between the two powers I named and this Government.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the position of the allies who have command of the sea is the same on this question. I shall not enter into the discussion of the question of armed merchantmen; I discussed that at some length a very short time ago, and I am entirely clear in my own mind as to the law and usages of nations in regard to armed merchantmen, that they can not be taken out of the class of peaceful traders, except by demonstration that they are commissioned vessels or that they carry an armament at least greater than that described in the circular of the Secretary of State at the opening of the war or that they are used for offensive purposes.

If I understand the position of the President, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, on the question of armed merchantmen and the right of neutrals to travel and to ship their goods on merchantmen armed within the limitations generally imposed, with that position I am in full accord. I think that neutrals have a right, established for centuries, to ship their goods and take passage on belligerent merchantmen, whether armed or unarmed, if armed within the limitations I have described.

The precise question, as I understand, presented by the President and also by the Senator from Missouri, is whether Congress favors passing a resolution warning American citizens to desist from the exercise of an undoubted right. I do not believe that any resolution can be drawn that will evade or by generalities get rid of the issue which has been raised. No matter how it has been raised, it has been raised on the precise point embodied in the Gore resolution in the Senate and in similar resolutions in the House, and if the President wishes a vote on that precise resolution and on the precise point raised by the resolutions I think he ought to have that vote from Congress.

His position, as I understand it, is that he is interfered with and hampered and crippled in his negotiations with foreign powers by the supposed attitude of Congress on this precise question, which is used against him in the negotiations which he is carrying on by the power with which he is negotiating. I think, under those circumstances, he has a right to know, the question having been raised, what the attitude of Congress is on that question of warning American citizens from the exercise of what have hitherto always been considered undoubted neutral rights. I do not think that it can be disposed of in any general terms, by any vote of general confidence, or any general resolutions stating the limitations between the Executive power in diplomatic negotiations and the legislative power. I think we must meet the question as it is presented.

The last administration warned citizens of the United States to leave Mexico. It was a matter of deep regret to many of that administration's supporters, and it was a subject of criticism by that administration's opponents. That warning has been renewed as to citizens in Mexico; but the criticism on the administration, the present administration, for the failure to protect American lives in Mexico, despite the warning given by the administration, has not ceased.

I myself have joined in that criticism, and it would be utterly impossible for me to criticize this administration for failure to protect American lives in Mexico, despite the warning that has been given, and then myself turn round and proclaim to the world that an American who exercised an equal right, to which he is equally entitled, on a belligerent merchantman should not have the protection of his country. I speak only for myself, but I can not apply two rules to a question like this.

The attitude which the President took in his letter to the Senator from Missouri and the attitude which the Senator from Missouri, no doubt with absolute authority and in carefully chosen words, has described to-day on the question of the rights of neutrals on belligerent merchantmen is the attitude I have always upheld. But now, Mr. President, looking at this question as I do, I think the President, hampered, as he tells us he is in the letter to Representative Pou, the acting chairman of the House Committee on Rules, that the supposed attitude of Congress is interfering with his negotiations, I think he has a right to ask for a vote on the precise proposition which is before Congress and to know whether he can go on with his negotiations with the Congress behind him or whether the Congress takes the view of the belligerent power with which he is at this moment negotiating.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will not delay in taking a vote on the precise and specific question of whether we ought to warn our citizens from exercising a right that has not been questioned in law or in the usages of nations for centuries past.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was never less disposed to make a speech, and very seldom less able physically to make one than I am to-day. But there are times in the history of all peoples, of all administrations, and of all parties when men come to the parting of the ways, when there is an unavoidable conflict, and when each man must stand as best he may for that which he thinks to be true and right and just and brave and patriotic.

In my opinion that time has come for you and me concerning the proposition which now faces us, and which has not faced us because of any action of the President of the United States, but which he has been compelled to confront by constant insinuations, constant nagging, constant quizzing, and constant expression here, of opinion in favor of the position assumed by negotiators of a foreign power as against our own. The time has come when for me, at any rate, the question states itself in this way: Shall I exclaim "America first," or shall I sing "Deutschland über Alles"?

For the politics motiving any side of this question, Mr. President, I have the highest contempt. The man who is a Representative at the other wing of this Capitol, or who is a Senator here, and who is looking behind him somewhere, at some racial vote of some sort, is not only not a patriotic American but he is a poor judge of human nature, and he is even a poor practical politician. Even from that last poor, miserable standpoint he is a foolish man. The moment that any political element or any factional element or any other element participating in government in the United States as voters or officials shall buttress themselves with the idea of pleasing a particular racial element in the United States, that moment those doing it make foolish politicians of themselves, if nothing lower; because that moment they consolidate every other element of diverse and different racial derivation in the United States against them and against what they are seeking to do, and they consolidate against themselves that element of American citizenship whose derivation is so ancient that it hardly knows what it was—just simply Americans, without frills and without embroideries and without hyphens or anything else. As little as you think of it, these last even have a right to live here, and they have a right to be heard as well as other people; and people such as I describe consolidate them against themselves, too, because American patriotism and American good sense take the position that for the citizenry of a country which is derived originally from every race under the sun, for we are not here as Norwegians, nor Swedes, nor Danes, nor Frenchmen, nor Englishmen, nor Welshmen, nor Scotchmen, nor Irishmen, nor Germans, nor Italians, nor Greeks; to cater to any one racially derived element smacks of treason. It is turning over our Government, or rather attempting to turn over our Government, to an element influenced by a foreign Government. We are here, if we have a moral right to participate in American Government at all, simply as Americans, and as nothing else; and therefore American patriotism, American ideals, everything that responds to the noblest that there is in Americanism, can be relied upon to decry and to push aside any man, set of men, faction, or self-seeking politician anywhere, whose idea of wise politics consists in pleasing some special racial element in the United States, no matter what that element is.

To be an Anglomaniac is so contemptible that it is beyond expression. There is one thing only that is more contemptible, and that is to be an Anglophobiac. To be a Teutomaniac is contemptible, despising our English law, literature, civilization, and political liberty; but there is something more contemptible than even that, and that is to be a Teutophobiac. And so I might go through with all the races which have contributed to the American caldron.

Mr. President, the initiative, with regard to foreign relations, lies with the Executive. Congress ought not to attempt to assume the initiative; but from various quarters the assumption or the attempt has been made, and day after day, through one innuendo or another, through one resolution or another, the Chief Magistrate of the United States has been prodded and nagged and dared—aye, dared—to do what? To surrender the initiative which the Constitution places with him and to let Congress take the initiative with regard to our foreign relations.

Well, some of you have nagged, and you have prodded, and you have "dared," until the patience of a very patient man has been exhausted; and now he says: "Very well. You have furnished comfort to the foreign negotiators. You have made them think that the American people were disunited and that they were not behind their Government. You have given them a contempt of their Government as the opposite negotiator. You have weakened my hands, you have partially paralyzed me, and now I want a 'show-down'; and I hope that in the eyes of the American people it will be a 'show-up' when you and I are through with it."

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is in one lone respect right. We want no evasion. We want no indirection. You have nagged and nagged and you have prodded, until now the President says, "All right." You have dared him, thrown down your several gloves or encouraged others to throw down theirs, until now he says: "I will pick up the gauntlet. I am tired. If the patriotism of Congress is behind me, let us find it out. If it is not, again let us find it out. If I am to be hamstrung and hampered, just go further and kill me as a negotiator and be done with it. If I am not the Executive of the United States Government and have not vested in me by the Constitution the initiative, if I can bring nothing to even an initiative conclusion without you, then say so, and let me and let the people of America and of foreign nations know that I am helpless. You have already done almost as much harm as you can by passing your resolutions. The only light I see is to table them. You have dared; I have submitted. I have looked as if I were afraid. I have plead with you, please not to go on hampering me and my Secretary of State with suggestions and arguments derived from foreign courts and embassies. In spite of it all, you keep it up. There must be an end of it, one way or the other."

Therefore, without evasion and without indirection, so far as I am concerned as a Senator of the United States, I say: "Bring the matter to an issue. Bring on your Gore resolution and bring on your other resolutions, and let a motion be made to table them, and see whether or not Senators are going to assume the responsibility before the American people of standing against the President upon a proposition where he stands upon a principle of international law 500 years old."

The President has offered for the consideration of the nations of the earth no new doctrine, no new proposition. The proposition that merchant ships defensively armed are still to be considered as merchant ships because they are not armed for offense, and because they are not commissioned as armed vessels, is a principle recognized even during the War between the States, recognized by the Federal Government, recognized by the Confederacy; and that was an internecine struggle where the ordinary laws were not always recognized. The principle is as old as modern civilization; and what Germany wants us to do is to change the international law pendente bello; or rather what she wants to do is to change it herself, and she is trying to make us particeps criminis in it against our own interest and right and against the interest and right of all neutrals everywhere.

Then, remember, it is an interest, it is a right involving life—not merely property or money.

Another principle is as old as international law itself, and that is that when a neutral purposely changes the theretofore recognized relations of nations under international law during a war, when the change must necessarily accrue to the benefit of one of the belligerents and to the damage of the other, that neutral nation has committed an unneutral act.

Talk about war! The only danger of war to-day, the only cloud upon the horizon, has come about from the fact that the President and the Secretary of State were not let alone to carry on negotiations, but that some of you must, forsooth, create the impression that the American people and the representatives of the American people were not behind the American Government, but were heart and soul with the opposite negotiator. It is to your action, and your action alone, in my opinion, that is due the last position taken by Germany. You may possibly have misled a foreign country into war with your own.

If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is wrong about one thing. It is a different thing to go out on the street and have a child undertake to assault you and turn around and run indoors and get away from the child and to let a man undertake to assault you and turn around and run away from him. There are a good many things that we can afford to take from a poor, weak, disorganized people without a responsible Government like Mexico that we can not afford to take from a great, brave, valiant, powerful people whose servants never do anything except under the deliberate orders of their Government. The two propositions are not upon the same ground.

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD, as expressing somewhat more extremely in some respects than I would express it if left to myself, an article from the New York World of March 1, 1916, entitled "How the poison works." I will ask to have it read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOW THE POISON WORKS.

Calling upon the German Government to decree the destruction of all ships bound for Great Britain, whether armed or not, the Vossische Zeitung, of Berlin, clinches its argument with this sinister suggestion:

"It is not without risk; but the risk, perhaps, is smaller since the American Congress shows signs of demanding that the decision in international affairs be taken from the President's hands and placed in those of Congress."

The poison is already working. The Bryanites, the Hearstites, and the Kaiserites in Congress who were implicated in the recent "revolt" against the President's foreign policies professed to be concerned only about neutrality and peace. Germans understand what that kind of neutrality and peace means. They know well enough that to substitute for the President's foreign policies the policy of his opponents in Congress is to give Germany a free hand to murder neutrals and noncombatants by whatever method of submarine warfare Berlin chooses to adopt.

There is grave risk in doing that sort of thing while the President is in command of the foreign relations of the United States. But after what happened in Washington it is natural that Germans should believe there would be no risk if Congress were in control, no matter how many American lives were sacrificed. What the Vossische Zeitung said yesterday other German newspapers will be saying to-morrow. The opinion is bound to grow steadily throughout the German Empire that the President has been morally repudiated by Congress, and that the war-making power of the American Government will never permit a finger to be lifted for the protection of American rights or American honor. Germans will be thoroughly in accord with Mr. MONDELL, a Republican Representative from Wyoming, who in the House yesterday described the President's attitude as "mock heroism" and denounced him for refusing to warn Americans off armed merchantmen at Germany's mandate.

There is only one effective way of dealing with this situation and disillusionizing Germany. That is to force a vote on the McLemore resolution, the Gore resolution, and the Jones resolution. There can be no doubt of the result of such a vote. Congress has heard from the country since its cloakroom insurrection, and Germany ought to hear from the country. That is the surest way to prevent the commission of a crime by German submarine commanders which might lead to war.

The sooner such a vote is taken the better, and if the Democratic leaders, to whom the President appeals in his remarkable letter to Mr. POU, will not bring it about, the World trusts that there is enough patriotism among the Republican leaders to compel a vote and put every Member of the House and Senate on record. Let us see whether the sentiment of Congress is "America first" or "Deutschland über Alles."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agree in great measure with what has been said by the Senator from Mississippi and by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not agree, however, that the attitude of a Senator touching the resolution referred to reflects his sympathy as between the European belligerents. In my own judgment, any American citizen who places the interest of Germany above that of America is a traitor to his country. Any American citizen who places the interest of the allies above the interest of America is a traitor to his country. These two types of traitors are equally offensive; they are equally disloyal; they are equally reprehensible.

I have little doubt that the American owners of ships flying the flags of the allies would like to see the United States police their vessels across the high seas and protect them against assault from any belligerent power. I have little doubt that the purchasers and the owners of the $500,000,000 worth of bonds recently issued by the allies would rejoice to see the United States underwrite their investment and guarantee the sovereignty and the ultimate success of their debtors. I have no more sympathy with them than I have with the hyphenated American who in the interests of Germany is disloyal to this country, whether it be his native or his adopted land.

Mr. President, whenever the honor, whenever the vital interests of this Republic are involved, whenever the essential rights of an American citizen have been invaded or violated, every American sword will leap from its scabbard. That sacred sentiment should not be trifled with. It should not be made a toy and a plaything in the hands of any madcap American citizen who may be disposed to venture his life upon the armed ship of a belligerent power.

I rather agree with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi that in accordance with immemorial international law neutral citizens have a right to travel on armed belligerent ships. I do not now draw into question the technical right, but I do assert that it is a right which is a survival of the age of piracy, and ought to expire with the age that gave it birth.

Mr. President, the right once existed under so-called international law or custom to murder prisoners of war. It was a right universally exercised; but the enlightened conscience of advancing civilization abrogated that brutal, that barbaric right. It was once a legal and a constitutional right in America to own human beings as slaves. The defenders of the system relied upon their sacred right under the Constitution and laws of the Republic. It was such a right until canceled with blood.

Mr. President, the progress of civilization consists largely in the withdrawal or modification of individual rights when they become incompatible with the paramount interests of organized society. In the State of the Senator from Mississippi, on account of a statute, I believe, a white man has no right to join in wedlock with a person of the colored race. I suppose this would be defended as a sacred right but for the prohibitory statute. That right in the District of Columbia remains to-day, and I can imagine a dreamy-eyed conservative resisting such a statute attempted here or elsewhere on the ground that it was a sacred right.

Mr. President, I think it true, perhaps, that any one of the 100,000,000 American citizens has a right to travel on an armed merchant ship. He has a right to run the risk of losing his own life and engulfing this Republic in a sea of carnage and of blood. I think any wayfarer, any madcap American citizen, may boast that as an inalienable, or rather I should say as an ancient right, vouchsafed to him by international law. I believe that the 100,000,000 American citizens have a right to be protected against such recklessness; that they have a right to be protected against the danger, against the possibility of any one of the 100,000,000 citizens exercising the right and the power to plunge this Republic into the European carnival of slaughter. Of course, the right of 100,000,000 to be protected against becoming involved in this butchery is not to be weighed in the balance with the sacred, the inherited right of a single irresponsible adventurer to imperil his own life, to throw away his own life, and to cause the sacrifice of millions of his fellow citizens together with billions of their treasure.

I do not weigh money in the balance with sacred and essential rights. My only contention is that pending this struggle the right should be withdrawn; that we should withdraw this sacred right in the interest of organized society, in the interest of the American people; that we ought to say, as the Senator from Mississippi would probably say to his daughter, "Do not sail on an armed ship." I doubt if the Senator from Massachusetts would consent that a child of his loins should embark upon the armed vessel of a belligerent power. And should not we, as the guardians of this Republic and the guardians of its most sacred interest, say to those Americans who are willing for love of pleasure or profit or adventure to take such a hazard, "Stay off these ships, forbear to exercise a right which may be fraught with such terrific consequences"?

Mr. President, with me it is a fixed conviction that American citizens ought not to travel on these vessels and that they should be warned not to exercise the right. Let me put a case. Suppose that 1,000 American citizens embark upon one of these armed vessels. It is sunk to the bottom of the sea by a German submarine. An investigation shows that it was armed for offensive purposes. Germany had a right to sink the ship at the sacrifice of a thousand American lives. Mr. President, what consolation to the dead or to their families would it be that by chance they had embarked upon a vessel armed for offensive rather than for defensive purposes? Would it not be infinitely better for them, and for their surviving families, to have been warned not to take so desperate a chance?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. From some statement the Senator has made and telegrams that I have received—more from the telegrams than from the statement just now made, of course—the impression prevails, certainly in some quarters, that this resolution is an attempt to withdraw the right of an American citizen to go on an armed ship. I do not understand that the resolution is an attempt by law to withdraw that right.

Mr. GORE. Not at all.

Mr. CLAPP. But it is the expression of Congress by the resolution that it is the sense of Congress that it is better not to exercise that technical or abstract right.

Mr. GORE. That is the point.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the understanding of the Senator from Oklahoma of the resolution?

Mr. GORE. That is the express term of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment, I do not think there is any misapprehension about it. The resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma withdraws no right. It only says to Americans if they exercise the right we will withdraw the protection.

Mr. GORE. That is doubtless implied.

Mr. CLAPP. There is such an apprehension, and the interruption has served the purpose of a disclaimer from both sides, because the telegrams that I have received clearly indicate that they believe it is an attempt to withdraw the right. I am very thankful to the Senator from Massachusetts for making it plain from the high standpoint of his authority—I say it in all deference—that the resolution does not seek to withdraw any legal right to go on armed ships if a person wants to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Right in connection with the question asked by the Senator from Minnesota, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma why he has introduced a concurrent resolution instead of a joint resolution or a bill that would be a law?

Mr. GORE. There are two reasons. I had previously introduced a bill covering these points. The two reasons are the fact that this resolution would not be ipso facto referred to a committee of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe——

Mr. GORE. Let me state the other reason. The other was that it is a simple expression of the sense of Congress and does not require the presidential signature.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I understood that perhaps the President would veto a joint resolution or a bill on the subject.

Mr. GORE. Undoubtedly he would.

Mr. NORRIS. But the passage of such a measure through the Senate and the House would at least have as much effect in the way of warning as a concurrent resolution that does not go to the President at all.

Mr. GORE. Of course, I may have exercised not the best judgment in deciding upon a concurrent rather than a joint resolution. I was influenced in reaching that decision, however, by the considerations which I have just suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not want the Senator to think that in what I said I was criticizing him. I agree with what the Senator said. It seems to me if we take any action at all it would be the part of wisdom to take, or attempt at least to take, action that would be effective and would make illegal the traveling on such ships from American ports that were thus armed.

Mr. GORE. I think that would be better, and I will state as I proceed an additional reason.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to submit a question to the Senator from Oklahoma, which I would be glad to have him discuss before he takes his seat. It is this: Suppose we should pass the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma just as it is drawn, and suppose the other branch of Congress should also express its views in that respect, and that as time proceeded some submarine should have destroyed 100 American lives, would the Senator from Oklahoma or those who take his view be willing to forego the right of the American Government to demand reparation for the loss of those people? Does this resolution in its final results relieve us of the high obligation which the Government is under to protect the citizen when he is doing no more than availing himself of a right which as a citizen he has? Would the Government wholly abandon the citizen because, forsooth, he should seek to travel on merchant ships?

Mr. GORE. My own judgment is that the adoption of this resolution by Congress would serve as an effectual warning to American citizens not to embark on these armed vessels.

The second clause expresses it as the sense of Congress that passports should not be issued to American citizens designing to travel on armed belligerent ships. I feel confident, since the issuance of passports is discretionary with the Secretary of State, that he would observe such an injunction on the part of Congress. I think, therefore, it would be entirely effective to accomplish the result which I have in view. I shall on the proper occasion make further answer to the suggestion of the Senator touching a declaration of war.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me there, I would suggest the difficulty of finding a difference in spirit as to the withholding of a passport under the Senator's resolution and the letter of the Department of State of October 4, 1915, in which it is stated:

> The department does not deem it appropriate or advisable to issue passports to persons who contemplate visiting belligerent countries merely for pleasure, recreation, touring, or sightseeing.

If the right to go upon an armed vessel is a right, as it is, and no resolution here must contemplate the abridgment of that right, it is also the right of an American to go into a belligerent country if he desires. I should like to have some one point out in spirit and principle the difference between the two suggestions.

Mr. GORE. There is absolutely no distinction in principle, so far as I am able to discriminate between the two. The order of the State Department that it will not issue passports to persons contemplating pleasure trips to belligerent countries is no less a sacrifice of a sacred, fundamental, inalienable, and immemorial right of the American citizen than would be a simple warning that in the interest of public peace he should not exercise the right to travel on a belligerent ship. In spirit and in purpose the two are identical. How they can be discriminated in principle other Senators may answer; I am unable to divine.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon another inquiry?

Mr. GORE. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. Is there any more reason for characterizing the Senator's resolution as siding with one side or the other in the European war in warning citizens to keep off armed vessels than there is in the attitude of the Department of State in saying that it will withhold passports from those seeking to visit belligerent countries for pleasure, recreation, touring, or sightseeing?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if there be such a distinction, it is past my power of analysis to detect it. I have no doubt——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. Yes; but let me finish this sentence. I have no doubt the senior Senator from Mississippi, with his incomparable power of analysis, and the Senator from Massachusetts, with equal power, will be able to find a substantial reason why passports should not be issued to American citizens to travel in belligerent countries where they could do so without peril to themselves or to their country which would not equally justify the withholding of passports from reckless adventurers who might involve our Nation in war. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator will yield, is there not this marked difference between the two cases? In the one case the order to which the Senator from Minnesota referred is the act of the Department of State acting within its right and within the limits of its duty as imposed upon it by the Constitution. The other is a proposed act or resolution of the Congress of the United States going outside of its purview and giving directions to the administrative department as to what it shall do in the exercise of its duty.

Mr. GORE. Why, Mr. President, if the Secretary of State has been invested with the discretion to deny a sacred and fundamental right to an American citizen, he has been given an authority that no single official should be permitted to exercise.

In the second place, if it is any usurpation of power on the part of Congress, the war-making power of this Republic, out of its solicitude for peace and for an honorable peace, to seek to avoid needless war, then this resolution is subject to the Senator's criticism.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, can the Senator from Oklahoma find any reason why the State Department can suspend this sacred and time-honored principle of international law any more than Congress can express an opinion that our citizens ought to be warned against going on belligerent vessels? Where does the Secretary of State find the authority to suspend international law?

Mr. GORE. I must refer that question to the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he can see any difference between a citizen who goes gallivanting around Europe sight-seeing and a citizen of the United States who has pressing business that calls him to that continent, which, if he were not able to go, might mean a sacrifice of all his holdings? Certainly the Senator from Oklahoma will not say to the Senate and to the country that he is unable to make a distinction between business and pleasure. In this case I can see that it makes a very wide and vital distinction.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there is no distinction in right. The State Department has no right to inquire, if this be a sacred and inalienable right, what the motive—what the object of the journey—may be. That, sir, would be a power fit only for despotism. Russia exercises the power to issue passports or not from one village to another. Shall the Secretary of State of this great democracy undertake to analyze the hearts of men, and, if they go for pleasure, deny them an immemorial right, and, if they go for business, accord to them that inviolable right?

But, Mr. President, what certificate can the Senator from Kentucky furnish the Senate that all those who journey upon these armed ships are bound upon imperious business that will not wait, rather than gallivanting to Europe as sight-seers? Are there no neutral ships that ply the sea? Are there no American vessels which are immune from attack? I say, let them wait for an American—for a neutral—ship.

But suppose the Senator's argument be true; suppose they are bound on the most imperious business, and that they embark, in the exercise of their sacred right, upon an armed ship and come to their death and the Republic to war, does the Senator think that it would have been an extreme act of tyranny to have denied them such right, such passport?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. In answer to the question of the Senator, I will say that if the President of the United States had been permitted to handle this question—a right that has always existed since the foundation of the Government in the President of the United States in regard to diplomatic questions—without interference from Congress, without a back-fire having been built here and without the impression and belief having been created in Germany that he was not in fact speaking for the American people, he might have been able to have gotten Germany to have agreed that the lives of all neutrals—men, women, and children, not only those of America, but the neutrals of the world—might have been saved from death by the attacks of submarines.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the availability of that subterfuge and I appreciate the implication which it carries. Mr. President, the worst of all cowards is the one who lacks the courage to do right. I shall discuss the point raised by the Senator from Kentucky in a moment.

My recollection is that the order of January 12, 1915, was an Executive order, the one to which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has referred. As I recall, in our note to Germany concerning the Lusitania, our protest was founded upon the fact that it was an unarmed merchant ship. I have conceded to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the proposition that possibly an American citizen in such a case is exercising an international right, notwithstanding the fact that the Secretary of State in his note to the powers on January 18 closed with this significant language:

> My Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

The Secretary of State admits that this sacred and immemorial right is a doubtful right. Sweden now warns her nationals not to embark upon these belligerent armed ships without any compromise of her dignity and with every prospect of continued independence and sovereignty.

Mr. President, I do not deny that the Executive Department is entitled to exercise authority in respect to our international relations. For that reason, I have not been disposed to press the measure which I introduced on January 5 for the accomplishment of this purpose.

There is some force in the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that we ought to have a "show-down" upon this point—perhaps not exactly the point involved in the resolution as I offered it. That would accomplish only in an indirect way the object which I had immediately before my eyes. That point is developed by the question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. When this resolution comes up for consideration, I hope to check that issue up to the Senate, as to whether or not the sinking of an armed merchant ship by a German submarine will be deemed by this Senate a sufficient cause for a declaration of war. That is the point involved in this controversy; that is the point which I sought to accomplish by this resolution—not directly, but indirectly and by implication. That issue should be presented squarely to the Senate.

Mr. President, let me observe this again. This is a fixed conviction on my part. I shall not now elaborate all the reasons upon which I base that conviction. I shall do that, if need be, on a proper occasion; but the general reasons upon which I have reached this conclusion have not actuated me entirely in presenting the pending resolution.

Mr. President, I introduced this resolution because I was apprehensive that we were speeding headlong upon war. Perhaps I ought to go further and say what I have hitherto avoided saying, that my action was based on a report, which seemed to come from the highest and most responsible authority, that certain Senators and certain Members of the House in a conference with the President of the United States received from the President the intimation, if not the declaration, that if Germany insisted upon her position the United States would insist upon her position; that it would result probably in a breach of diplomatic relations; that a breach of diplomatic relations would probably be followed by a state of war; and that a state of war might not be of itself and of necessity an evil, but that the United States by entering the war now might be able to bring it to a conclusion by midsummer and thus render a great service to civilization.

Mr. President—

> I can not tell how the truth may be;
> I say the tale as 'twas said to me.

This came to my ears in such a way, with such a concurrence of testimony, with such internal and external marks of truth, that I feared it might possibly be the truth; and if such a thing be even conceivable, I did not feel that, discharging my duty as a Senator, I could withhold whatever feeble service I might render to avert the catastrophe of war. Now, I do not know that this report is the truth. I simply suggest it as explaining my own conduct.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi are right in saying that the President has a right to know whether Congress will back him in the opinion, if he has such an opnion, that the sinking of an armed belligerent ship will be a sufficient cause for war; and I think, too, Mr. President, that Members of the Senate and that Members of the other House have a right to know whether the opinions and sentiments ascribed to the President were given in their interview with him.

Mr. President, of course, if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will deny that suggestions of that sort, in substance, were made, his denial would be convincing upon that point.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not know why the Senator from Oklahoma quotes me as saying——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not quote the Senator as saying it; not at all.

Mr. STONE. Then I say, in all fairness to the President and to the facts of the case, so far as they are within my knowledge, that the President never stated to me or in my hearing that he believed in any way, or in any way entertained the thought, that war between the United States and the central powers would be desirable or would result in good to the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will accept the sub rosa remark of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that the President has a passion for peace. We all have a passion for peace. Yet I want to say in this place that I am not for peace at any price. I do not believe that all peace is honorable, nor do I believe that all war is dishonorable. Our Revolution was surcharged with glory.

Mr. President, I heard in such a way, analyzing the evidence, that I apprehended there was foundation in fact that the President suggested to the Senator that the United States might bring the war to a close by the middle of the summer. Am I right in that, may I ask the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. The President of the United States made no such statement to me as quoted by the Senator from Oklahoma. Whatever the President said to me, Mr. President, is something that I do not care to repeat. When I go to the White House to hold a conversation with the President, or when I go anywhere to hold a conversation with a Senator or any other official, what he says to me is sacred. I have not repeated conversations I have had with the President. I have stated impressions that the conversations I had with him made upon my mind, and I stated them, in substance, in a letter I wrote to the President, which was given to the public, but I have not repeated the conversations themselves.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I made no intimation that the Senator had repeated the President's conversation with him.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator tells us that the fear created by this rumor which came to his ears of probable war caused him to introduce this resolution. The Senator is on perfectly good terms with the President, is he not?

Mr. GORE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Why, then, did not the Senator go to the President himself and ascertain at first hand the facts?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if I received an invitation to accompany the Senator from Indiana and others, it was overlooked.

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, this matter was of such pressing importance and so vital to the Senator's country—the present Chief Executive is the head of his own party and the Senator is one of the President's closest friends. The question I ask the Senator is why he himself did not go—the President would have been very glad to have seen him—and he could have ascertained from the President himself just what he said and just what he thought?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I profess to enjoy no such confidential relationship that might lead me to expect to be apprised of his views if they were of that description. No one could wish to become the custodian of such a secret, if true. I acted, as I say, upon what seemed to be a reliable report, and which I did not feel at liberty to disregard. Of course, I may have been in error about it. Mr. President, I acted in the lurid light of those impressions. Certainly I did not undertake to quote what the President said to Senators, nor did I intimate that the Senator had reported to me or repeated to me his conversation with the President, but many Senators and Representatives heard the same report. Indeed, sir, that report, whether true or untrue, is largely responsible for the serious anxiety which has been pervading the Senate. That report, whether true or untrue, is largely responsible for the unexampled agitation which has been prevailing in the other House. The point I make is that if the report be untrue, the Senate and the House have a right to know that it is untrue, that their alarms may be allayed, and that the existing tension may be relieved. If, on the other hand, it should be true, no one could deny that the whole country has a right to know that it is true. If it be untrue, of course, everybody must be gratified. In the light of the truth, and the truth only, I desire to pursue the path of duty.

Mr. President, with these observations, merely suggesting that when the time comes I will make an effort to present the real issue to the Senate, I may say that I have nothing further to offer at this time except that I possess only finite wisdom, and I was doing my duty as I saw it under the circumstances and under the lights available.

Let me say further, in conclusion, that I have no disposition to interfere with diplomatic relations or negotiations so long as they do not impinge upon the constitutional power of Congress to declare war—to control the issue of peace and war—but I am not willing to be involved in war with Germany or any other power on account of the particular question here involved. Whenever the honor, whenever the vital interests, of the United States, whenever the essential rights of any American citizen are violated or outraged, I shall go as far as who goes farthest to place at the disposal of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy every available man and every available dollar, whether that power be Germany or any other nation under the sun. As an American standing for Americans only I have no choice of enemies.

Mr. President, I ask leave to append to my remarks the note of the Secretary of State as published in the Chicago Herald of recent date; also a notice by the Secretary of State to American citizens who contemplate visiting belligerent countries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The note was dated January 18, and has been received by the Herald from a European correspondent. Its text is as follows:

"It is a matter of the deepest interest to my Government to bring to an end, if possible, the dangers of life which attend the use of submarines as at present employed in destroying enemy commerce on the high seas, since on any merchant vessel of belligerent nationality there may be citizens of the United States who have taken passage or members of the crew in the exercise of their recognized rights as neutrals. I assume your Government is equally solicitous to protect their nationals from the exceptional hazards which are presented by their passage on merchant vessels through these portions of the high seas in which undersea craft of the enemy are operating.

UPHOLDS SUBMARINES' USE.

"While I am fully alive to the appalling loss of life among noncombatants, regardless of age or sex, which has resulted from the present method of destroying merchant vessels without removing the persons on board to places of safety, and while I view that practice as contrary to those humane principles which should control belligerents in the conduct of their naval operations, I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this practical branch of warfare on the high seas.

"In order to bring submarine warfare within the general rules of international law and the principles of humanity without destroying their efficiency in their destruction of commerce, I believe that a formula may be found which, though it may require slight modification of the precedent generally followed by nations prior to the employment of the submarine, will appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of all the belligerents in the present war.

"Your Government will understand that in seeking the formula or rule of this nature I approach it of necessity from the point of view of a neutral, but I believe that it will be equally efficacious in preserving the lives of noncombatants on merchant vessels of belligerent nationalities.

BASIS OF PROPOSALS.

"My comments on this subject are predicated on the following propositions:

"First. A noncombatant has a right to traverse the high seas in a merchant vessel entitled to fly a belligerent flag, to rely upon the observance of the rules of international law and principles of humanity, and if the vessel is approached by a naval vessel of another belligerent, the merchant vessel of enemy nationality should not be attacked without being ordered to stop.

"Second. An enemy merchant vessel, when ordered to do so by a belligerent submarine, should immediately stop.

"Third. Such vessel should not be attacked after being ordered to stop unless it attempts to flee or to resist. In case it ceases to flee or resist, the attack should be discontinued.

"Fourth. In the event that it is impossible to place a prize crew on board of an enemy merchant vessel or to convoy it into port, the vessel may be sunk, provided the crew and passengers have been removed to a place of safety.

OBSTACLES FOR SUBMARINES.

"In complying with the foregoing principles, which, in my opinion, embody the principal rule, the strict observance of which will insure the life of a noncombatant on a merchant vessel which is intercepted by a submarine, I am not unmindful of the obstacles which would be met by undersea craft as commerce destroyers.

"Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war, and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offensive against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

POWERLESS IN DEFENSE.

"The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

"Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantment superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

"If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

INNOCENT LIVES AT STAKE.

"It would, therefore, appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

"In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government, I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal rights which may be denied on account of new conditions.

STAND ON QUESTION SOUGHT.

"I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

"I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly."

NOTICE TO AMERICAN CITIZENS WHO CONTEMPLATE VISITING BELLIGERENT COUNTRIES.

All American citizens who go abroad should carry American passports, and should inquire of diplomatic or consular officers of the countries which they expect to visit concerning the necessity of having the passports viséed therefor.

American citizens are advised to avoid visiting unnecessarily countries which are at war, and particularly to avoid, if possible, passing through or from a belligerent country to a country which is at war therewith.

It is especially important that naturalized American citizens refrain from visiting their countries of origin and countries which are at war therewith.

It is believed that Governments of countries which are in a state of war do not welcome aliens who are traveling merely for curiosity or pleasure. Under the passport regulations prescribed by the President January 12, 1915, passports issued by this Government contain statements of the names of countries which the holders expect to visit and the objects of their visits thereto. The department does not deem it appropriate or advisable to issue passports to persons who contemplate visiting belligerent countries merely for "pleasure," "recreation," "touring," "sight-seeing," etc.

As belligerent countries are accustomed, for self-protection, to scrutinize carefully aliens who enter their territories, American citizens who find it necessary to visit such countries should, as a matter of precaution and in order to avoid detention, provide themselves with letters or other documents, in addition to their passports, showing definitely the objects of their visits. In particular it is advisable for persons who go to belligerent countries as representatives of commercial concerns to carry letters of identification or introduction from such concerns.

Naturalized American citizens who receive American passports are advised to carry their certificates of naturalization with them, as well as their passports

American citizens sojourning in countries which are at war are warned to refrain from any conduct or utterances which might be considered offensive or contrary to the principles of strict neutrality.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 4, 1915.

NOTE.—An application for a passport must be accompanied by duplicate unmounted photographs of the applicant, not larger than 3 by 3 inches in size, one affixed to the back of the application by the clerk of court before whom it is executed, with an impression of the seal of the court; the other to be affixed to the passport by the department.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SHIELDS obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent to have Senate resolution 107 referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator. There was so much noise in the Chamber that we could not hear anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was a request to send a resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will not object to that request, but I will object to any further requests for unanimous consent for the transaction of morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I have objected to so many requests of the same kind that I feel I shall have to object to this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the resolution can not be referred.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment now being considered by the Senate is that proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the sixth section of the bill, and is in effect a substitute for that section. The provisions of the bill concerning the purchase price or compensation to be paid to a company making a development under a permit granted by the Secretary of War, for its property, when taken over by the United States for operation or to be disposed of to some other person or company under a like permit, at the expiration of the original permit, are contained in section 6 of the bill. This section is in these words:

SEC. 6. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures, required by the United States, and assuming all contracts entered into by the grantee which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made. The fair value of said property and the reasonableness and good faith of such contracts shall be determined by agreement between the Secretary of War and the grantee, and, in the event of their failure to reach unanimous agreement, then by proceedings in equity instituted by the United States in the district court of the United States in the district within which any portion of such dam may be located. In the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted.

Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to this section in these words:

When the property is acquired by the United States under the provisions of this bill it may renew the permit for a like term, or may operate it or otherwise dispose of it under a similar permit and upon similar terms under then existing laws.

The particular part of this provision that is affected by the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is that requiring the United States or the new permittee to pay to the original permittee the fair value of its property when taken over, other than the lock or locks or other aids to navigation, and capital expenditures required to be made by the United States, for which cost only is to be paid.

The Senator from Montana has offered an amendment, to be inserted at the end of section 6, in these words:

Nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] covers the same matter as that of the Senator from Montana but goes much further in its limitations upon the compensation to be paid the original permittee for the property taken over and the final adjustment of his rights under the permit upon its expiration, excluding all but the value of the physical property, and omits the provision for the performance of uncompleted contracts of the permittee.

The proposed amendments provide that the depreciation in the value of the original permittee's property, including diversion and generating works, appurtenances, and land upon which the same are situated, resulting from use, wear, tear, and lapse of time, shall be deducted from the purchase price; and further, that no allowance shall be made beyond the cost of any of such property; thus, while requiring all depreciation in value to be deducted, denying appreciation in value that may accrue to any part of the property, real or personal.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered and ably advocated an amendment much the same in effect as those I have stated, but upon consideration it was rejected by the Senate yesterday by a decisive vote. The Senators advocating the two amendments now pending have presented their views upon the same with great force and ability, but I have been unable to agree with them in their conclusions.

Mr. President, in my opinion there is no sound reason why the ordinary rules of ascertaining the value of property, which the owner is compelled by contract limitation or by law to part with, should not apply when the property of a permittee is taken over under the provisions of this bill. The permittee should be paid just compensation for his property, which is its fair value at the time taken. The value of the permit should not and can not be included as a part of this value, because it has expired and is nonexistent. This is the first effort that I know of to establish a different rule from that of just compensation.

The real estate of a power company ordinarily represents from 10 to 20 per cent of its total investment, and the remaining 80 or 90 per cent is represented by the buildings, structures, transmission lines, machinery, and fixtures, which naturally and unavoidably depreciate by use and the lapse of time, and incidentals necessary to the business and plant. And as a rule public-service corporations are obliged to pay the full value of lands which they acquire for corporate purposes, and those acquired for water-power development, being generally located in remote places, do not often increase in value, and there is not so much involved in the method of its valuation as that of the other property.

The words "fair value" are synonymous with "reasonable value." The former words were selected because they were believed to express what would be just and right between the grantee and the United States or any subsequent lessee and are ordinarily used in reference to matters here concerned.

The words used in the general dam act of 1910 are "reasonable value."

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Tennessee think we can fix a value by legislation that is not a fair value, and enforce it when we come to take over the property? Would we not be obliged, under the Constitution, to make fair compensation for the property that we took over?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Tennessee agrees with the Senator from California in regard to that matter, as will appear when he comes to the question.

I will read from the statute to which I refer. It appears in this provision of it:

That Congress may revoke any rights conferred in pursuance of this act whenever it is necessary for public use, and, in the event of any such revocation by Congress, the United States shall pay the owners of any dam and appurtenant works built under authority of this act, as full compensation, the reasonable value thereof, exclusive of the value of the authority or franchise granted, such reasonable value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of War and the said owners, and in case they can not agree, then by proceedings instituted in the United States circuit court for the condemnation of such properties.

These same words, "reasonable value," are also used in the Connecticut dam bill and were approved in the report of Senator Burton, for the Commerce Committee, recommending the passage of that bill. I shall read them:

Section 5 contains a provision materially different from those of former grants of this character. It is provided that at the expiration of the 50-year period contemplated by the general dam act the original grant may be renewed, transferred to other parties, or withheld. In the event that the grant is transferred to other parties, the Government shall require as a condition of the transfer of the property that the new grantee shall compensate the original grantee for the property acquired at a reasonable valuation. In the event that the United States refuses to renew the grant it shall itself make such compensation.

This provision is based upon the theory that if the Federal Government restricts its grantee to reasonable earnings, which appears to be a policy necessary to enforce in the interests of the public, it shall also provide, as far as may be expedient, for the security of the necessary bona fide investment. The effect of this stipulation will be to cure, in its application to this grant, an undoubted defect of the general dam act and to make this system of legislation conform to the well-known methods obtaining in the case of long leases of land, providing for an appraisal and purchase of improvements at the expiration of the lease.

The majority of the committee feel that the provisions contained in this bill are exceedingly desirable, both in the interests of an enlarged improvement of a certain class of streams and also for the utilization of our water powers under provisions which will safeguard fully the public interests, and therefore earnestly recommend the passage of this bill.

All the former statutes that I have examined contain similar provisions providing for the payment of "the fair value" or "the reasonable value" of the property.

What is fair value in these cases must always depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and is a question peculiarly proper for judicial determination. The courts of the country have frequently had the question here involved before them in determining the rights of parties in similar matters, and the rule which they have announced and applied as just and equitable is substantially that provided in this bill.

The meaning of the phrase "fair value" is well defined and its flexibility in application to different facts and conditions is well established, as will readily appear from reference to a few of the adjudged cases upon the subject.

The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Wilcox against Consolidated Gas Co., Two hundred and twelfth United States, page 19, upheld the lower court in its approval of the appreciation allowance in the following language:

And we concur with the court below in holding that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the rates. If the property which legally enters into the consideration of the question of the rates has increased in value since it was acquired, the company is entitled to the benefit of such increase. This is, at any rate, the general rule. We do not say that there may not be possibly an exception to it where the property may have increased so enormously in value as to render the rate permitting a reasonable return upon such increased value unjust to the public.

The same court, in the so-called Minnesota Rate cases, said:

It is clear that in ascertaining the present value we are not limited to the consideration of the amount of the actual investment. If that has been reckless or improvident, losses may be sustained which the community should not underwrite. As the company may not be protected in its actual investment if the fair value of the property be plainly less, so the making of a just return for the use of the property involves the recognition of its fair value if it be more than its cost. The property is held in private ownership, and it is that property and not the original cost of it of which the owner may not be deprived without due process of law.

In the case of Omaha v. Omaha Water Co. (218 U. S., 180), it is said:

The appraisers, in making their estimates of valuation, included $562,712.45 for the "going value." This separation of an element contributing to the value of each tangible part was done because required to be done under an order made in the circuit court in a suit in which the water board of the city of Omaha was complainant and the members of the board of appraisers and the water company were defendants. The object of that suit was to instruct the appraisers in respect to the mode and manner in which they should proceed. An order resulted which required the board to report the separate elements making up the aggregate value of the plant.

This option to purchase excluded any value on account of unexpired franchise; but it did not limit the value to the bare bones of the plant, its physical properties such as its lands, its machinery, its water pipes or settling reservoirs, nor to what it would take to reproduce each of its physical features. The value in equity and justice must include whatever is contributed by the fact of the connection of the items making a complete and operating plant. The difference between a dead plant and a live one is a real value and is independent of any franchise to go on or any mere good will as between such a plant and its customers. That kind of good will, as suggested in Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. (212 U. S., 19), is of little or no commercial value when the business is, as here, a natural monopoly, with which the customer must deal, whether he will or no. That there is a difference between even the cost of duplication less depreciation of the elements making up the water-company plant and the commercial value of the business as a going concern is evident. Such an allowance was upheld in National Water Works v. Kansas City (62 Fed. Rep., 853).

With reference to "intangible elements": The inclusion of going concern among intangibles is clearly authorized in the case of Knoxville v. Water Co. (212 U. S., 1), where this language appears:

The first fact essential to the conclusion of the court below is the valuation of the property devoted to the public uses, upon which the company is entitled to earn a return. That valuation ($608,000) must now be considered. It was made up by adding to the appraisement, in minute detail of all the tangible property, the sum of $10,000 for "organization, promotion, etc.," and $60,000 for "going concern." The latter sum, we understand to be an expression of the added value of the plant as a whole over the sum of the values of its component parts, which is attached to it because it is in active and successful operation and earning a return. We express no opinion as to the propriety of including these two items in the valuation of the plant, for the purpose for which it is valued in this case, but leave that question to be considered when it necessarily arises. We assume, without deciding, that these items were properly added in this case. The value of the tangible property found by the master is, of course, $608,000 lessened by $70,000, the value attributed to the intangible property, making it $538,000.

The inquiry has been made by several Senators whether this bill was submitted to the Secretary of War, and I have given the information that the bill introduced and favorably reported by the Commerce Committee at the last session was submitted to and substantially approved by him.

The present bill was first introduced in December, 1915, and a copy of it was sent to the Secretary of War. It was favorably reported to the Senate about January 15, 1916.

Afterwards, January 26, 1916, the Secretary of War appeared before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and read a carefully prepared paper on the subject, expressing views with which the principles and provisions of the present bill are in substantial accord.

As the Senators think the views of the Secretary of War are important in regard to this matter, it will not be inappropriate for me to read what he said in that statement concerning the valuation of the property when taken over by the Government and leased or sold to another grantee. I read from page 16 of that statement:

RECAPTURE AND ELEMENTS OF VALUATION.

Of course, there should be a provision for "recapture," as has just been indicated (g) supra, but a real difficulty is to be encountered in attempting to lay down specific rules in determining the elements of valuation for recapture purposes. There are those who would lay down a rule which would exclude all intangible elements; on the other hand, there are those who contend that such a rule would be eminently unfair and unwise, in that it would be prohibitive of all development. It seems to me that the valuation should include the property necessarily appurtenant and useful in the conduct of the business, and that there is no good reason for prescribing specific rules to determine what should be included in fair value. It seems to me that it would be unwise to adopt a rule which would expressly exclude or expressly include such intangible elements of valuation, but that these things should be left to be excluded or included according as to whether they may in a particular case, upon fair judgment, be said to be or not to be an element of fair valuation, to be determined in the first case by mutual agreement between the Secretary of War and the grantee, and upon disagreement by a Federal court.

I have never been able to see why the subject should not be left so, to be passed upon finally by a court in the light of the rules for valuation deemed applicable to the particular case. By so leaving it the Secretary of War, and the courts after him, will be free and untrammeled to apply the rules that are just and equitable. There is much difference of opinion now as to what elements should be considered in the valuation, either for rate making or for recapture purposes. There is no fixed rule to determine such things; the law is largely in the making. Certainly intangible elements have been frequently included within fair valuation. The Supreme Court of the United States has admitted them. "Each case," said Justice Hughes in the Minnesota rate cases, "must rest on its special facts," and he there stated that the ascertainment of fair value is not controlled by artificial rule, and is not a matter of formulas, but "must be a reasonable judgment, having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts." While the law on the subject is, as just said, largely in the making, still, it is clear that public-service commissions under judicial supervision do include intangible elements as elements of fair value, and the courts have recognized the propriety of doing so in many cases, although it does appear to me that the present tendency is to restrict rather than enlarge, but certainly not to exclude all such elements. The rules of valuation for public-purchase purposes have been, if anything, even less satisfactorily developed than have been the rules for rate-making purposes, probably because such purchases have not become an established practice of government, but wherever the courts and public-service commissions have had occasion to consider the elements of valuation for this purpose with those for rate-making purposes they have been inclined to recognize a more liberal rule in purchase cases.

The thing of real importance in a rate case is not so much the fair value of the property alone or a fair return alone but a combination of the two, whereas in the matter of public purchase there is only one thing of importance, and that is of fixed and final importance, namely, the fair value of the property. It seems to me if the Government is going to take over the property of the grantee and operate it for its own uses, or is to take it over for the purpose of disposing of it to a new grantee, it should not rely upon its sovereignty to invoke a rule differing from that which should govern transactions between private parties or between a grantee and a State. In all such cases the basis of value for rate purposes and public-purchase purposes involving, as it does, questions of vested property right must necessarily be fixed in the last instance by the Supreme Court of the United States. And I think we should be satisfied to trust the courts in the last instance to determine what fair value is, and an act which permits the courts to apply an open mind to the subject would seem to me to be subject to no just criticism. Of course, the rights acquired from the Government ought not to enter as an element of valuation, either for rate making or recapture purposes.

Mr. President, I can not conceive what principle of equity or common justice, which should control relations between individual and individual, and more certainly between the sovereign, with all of its wealth and power to support it, and one of its citizens in a matter affecting the private property rights of that citizen, that will authorize the provisions contained in these amendments for appropriating the property of a person or of corporations, the beneficial interest in the property of which is in their stockholders, without paying to them just compensation for every element and item of commercial value that it possesses, and which would be considered and paid for in a settlement between citizen and citizen in any similar transaction.

The development of the great natural resources of our rivers is not an immoral or unlawful business which should be penalized in this way.

Is it creditable to the United States to take advantage of its police power over navigable streams to compel riparian proprietors to donate to it part of the well-established value of their property under the penalty of being prohibited from using it? There is no question that a confiscation of this kind—for a property interest required to be surrendered by duress is confiscation—violates the limitations of the Constitution of the United States. Legislation of this kind, in the absence of a contractual feature, would be a denial of due process and taking of private property for a public use without just compensation. These constitutional provisions—the due-process clause and that providing for "just compensation" for private property condemned for a public purpose—apply to and include not only physical property but every possible interest, tangible and intangible, of value that the owner has in property.

Is it right for the United States to evade these constitutional limitations by coercing one of its citizens to contract to surrender his propery rights to it? Is this Government in such financial straits and fallen so low in its greed for revenue and property that it will in this manner coerce its citizens? It is no palliation that it is claimed to be in the people's interest, or, in other words, for a public purpose. There is no other case in which such a rule is applied. The United States has the power of eminent domain to condemn property for any purpose or use which it is authorized by the Constitution to accomplish, and if the property rights of a riparian proprietor are required for a public purpose at this time it should be immediately condemned and paid for, and if the exigencies of the future, say 50 years hence, require public ownership of the property, it can then be acquired under proper condemnation proceedings; but in each case, under the fifth amendment of the Constitution, a part of the Federal bill of rights, just compensation should be and must be paid to the owner.

It must be kept in mind in considering these amendments that they apply to the private property of the companies making the development and not to the public lands that may have been leased by the company, for those leases expire with the permit. Nor must it be forgotten that the provisions of these proposed amendments fixing the terms for taking over the property of persons who have made water-power developments apply equally to subdivisions of States and municipalities which have made similar developments. Is it right for the United States to coerce these arms of the States, created for local self-government, to part with property purchased and constructed with taxes collected from their inhabitants, for the benefit of the Federal Treasury or that of the whole people of the United States? Are Senators willing to do the municipalities and the States in which they reside this injustice? Would it not be taking their property without compensation?

There should be a limit upon the life of these permits for the protection of possible necessities of navigation, and I also think that such limitation may aid in regulating the rates to be charged consumers of water power and its manifold products; but I do believe there should be ample provisions for the protection of the rights of the persons who have invested their money in riparian property and its laudable development, and that if it be taken from them to be operated either by the United States or a new lessee they should receive "just compensation," which is "fair value."

These provisions are in their effect and operation only another method of collecting toll or rent from property for the benefit of the Federal Government in which that Government has no possible proprietary interest. There is no difference in requiring the payment to be made in advance, or annually, and at the end of the term of the permit by requiring the permittee to surrender some of the legitimate elements of the value of the property. The result is the same to the property owner or the consumer who will at last pay for it. It is, in substance, a taking of private property without just compensation. The permit granted passes no property interest and is not a valuable consideration. It is a mere police permit to the owner to use his property.

The United States Senate has considered these questions many times, and in every instance, by decided majorities, it has rejected all propositions in whatever form they have been presented to allow the United States to collect from riparian proprietors of navigable streams tribute of any kind for permission to exercise their property rights. The Senate has gone upon record three times by aye-and-nay votes during the consideration of this bill in rejecting propositions of this kind. Indeed, Mr. President, the conception of some theorist which obtained publicity and prominence about 10 years ago that a great Federal revenue should in this way be raised to the prejudice of the rights of the sovereign States and their citizens has been largely abandoned, and especially by many officials whose duties require them to study water-power development and prominent disinterested citizens who have given the matter attention. It is believed by them that prompt development of the water-power resources of this country for the benefit directly of the inhabitants of the district where they are found and indirectly in forwarding the interests of all the people in cheap power and the manufacture of high explosives and fertilizers should not be retarded by a policy of doubtful propriety, justice, and constitutionality when viewed in its most favorable light.

Mr. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey of the United States, in a recent article entitled "The people's interest in water-power resources" upon this subject, said:

Engineering skill has created, through the turbine and the long-distance transmission line, a public utility of the first rank. It is now a problem in social economics to secure for the people the real advantages of these modern inventions. Too often in the past the wealth won by the engineer from the mine, the forest, or the stream has been monopolized by the capitalist. Experience is teaching the American people to regard industrial development as a public matter in which others than owners of stocks and bonds are concerned.

Too often the public interest in water-power resources has been discussed almost wholly in terms of compensation, tolls, and charges for the publicly owned resources utilized. The revenue idea connected with this conservation issue has been allowed to overshadow the thought of control in the public interest. A notable exception to this tendency is contained in the Pend Oreille permit issued in 1913 by Secretary Lane, which provides that after the 10 years allowed for construction of plant and development of market the rate of compensation to the Government shall vary inversely as the square of the proportional development of the site and directly as the square of the average price charged for electric energy to both customers and consumers. While protection of the ultimate consumer is the purpose of these terms, the return to the Government, as will be seen, is determined by the receipts of the operator. Here the objects plainly sought are prompt and complete development and low rates to the public rather than revenue to the Government.

Mr. Secretary Fisher has entertained similar views upon this question. In the hearings on the development and control of water power before the National Waterways Commission he said:

I should put it in the statute—

Referring to the term—

50 years—not more than 50 years—as the term of a grant. I do not think it is necessary to have a longer period, and I do not think any engineer or promoter interested cares for it beyond that length of time. He will never get a bond issue to extend beyond that length of time. He must take care of his finances in most cases within a shorter period than that. If you do not grant him a renewal, you must take care of the capital invested in the plant. You must follow one of two principles—you have either got to say that this concern can charge during a particular period of the grant a rate which will enable it to retire the principal or you must provide that you will protect the principal as it stands at the end of the grant. You may prefer that the grantee shall turn over the investment at the end of the grant to the public for nothing. I can not understand that policy. That means the people living during the 50-year period are going to have to pay for the entire investment, and that posterity will get it for nothing. But if you think posterity should share the burden with us—and I personally incline that way—I would be in favor of saying, "You provide adequate funds for depreciation, renewals, and obsolescence, and we will take your plant over at the end of the period at the then value of the plant if you do not continue.

And again, in response to an interrogatory by the chairman of the committee as to whether he is in favor of a bonus, he said:

I would not pay any bonus at the end of the 50-year period, but would pay the value of the property at the time as it then stood.

Mr. President, I also wish to call attention to a statement upon this subject in the preliminary report of the United States National Waterways Commission made by Senator Theodore E. Burton as chairman. Among the members of the commission were Senators JACOB H. GALLINGER, S. H. Piles, WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, F. M. SIMMONS, JAMES P. CLARKE, and Representatives STEPHEN M. SPARKMAN, JOHN A. MOON, and others.

I read from page 24 of that report:

The commission is of the opinion that the Federal Government has no proprietary right or interest in navigable waters which would authorize the collection of tolls. The right, if it exists at all, rests upon either the second or third theory stated. As regards the second theory, it should be said that the imposition of tolls, unless based upon a more substantial foundation than the mere authority to grant or withhold consent—an authority arising solely from the control of the Federal Government for the purposes of navigation—does not commend itself to the commission, and it is to be doubted whether, even in case a bill should be passed or other action taken by Congress for granting this permission, with a provision for charging tolls, such tolls could be collected. Regarding the third theory stated, it should be noted that under the exercise of the taxing power Congress can levy taxes for general revenue purposes upon all classes of water power, whether in navigable or nonnavigable streams, and if charges are to be imposed it would seem that this is the normal method. It should further be borne in mind that a requirement for the imposition of tolls where the right to construct dams is hereafter granted would cause a discrimination between water power to be utilized under future permits and those already enjoyed, which are subject to no such charge. It must of course be remembered that whenever the privilege of constructing dams is granted in a navigable stream there is an undoubted right to impose charges sufficient to pay the expenses of examination and supervision and to secure the Government against cost by reason of obstacles to navigation created by the erection of dams; but this rests upon an entirely different principle from the proposal to charge tolls.

The control of the Federal Government over navigable streams has to do with navigation only, and in the exercise of this jurisdiction the plan commends itself to the commission of inserting in each grant or franchise under which the consent to construct a dam is given a condition that the grantee who constructs the dam must also, whenever necessary to subserve the interests of navigation, construct a lock suited to the locality and to the probable development of traffic, and also furnish power for the proper operation of the lock or locks. These requirements, rather than the imposition of tolls, appeal to the commission because they are free from legal objections and are in entire accordance with the objects for which the Federal Government has jurisdiction over navigable streams.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do for a question.

Mr. HUSTING. I have the final report of the National Waterways Commission for 1912, being Senate Document 469. Is the Senator reading from that document?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I have not that document here.

Mr. HUSTING. What the Senator has read is not on page 24 of the copy of the report I have, and I thought perhaps he was wrong.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have read from the preliminary report of the commission, on page 24.

The chief object of legislation of this character should always be to advance the interest of the consumers of electric energy and the production of cheap power. It is along this line, and for this purpose, that this bill was framed. I will read from one other public official upon this subject. Mr. O. C. Merrill, chief of engineers of the Forestry Service, in his address at the Portland conference said:

In considering matters of legislation it should be recognized at the outset that the public, as consumers of power, are interested only in securing adequate service at reasonable rates. Toward these two ends all legislation should be directed, and no measure should become law which does not, either directly or indirectly, have these purposes in view. To gain these ends two steps are essential: First, to provide conditions, as far as legislation can provide them, under which power may be developed at reasonable cost, and, second, when so developed to provide the means for obtaining its sale at a reasonable price, that price being reasonable which allows just so much return to capital, and no more, as will insure the maintenance of an adequate supply.

* * * * * * *

Of all the elements that enter into the cost of developing a power system the only one that can be altered by legislation is the cost of capital. To secure cheap capital it is necessary to protect the investment and to provide the conditions under which reasonable returns may be assured.

The property of these companies will be taxed, as it should be taxed, by the State, and no one need have fear, judging by the past, but that it will be fully taxed for conducting its business, exercising its franchise, and upon the value of the property by what is called an ad valorem tax.

Mr. President, let us examine the details of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

That of the Senator from Montana does not alter the provision of the bill for the payment of the fair value of the property, but in ascertaining this it excludes so many elements of value as to destroy that requirement.

The amendments of the Senator from Iowa are radically different, and they undertake to specify more in detail what elements of value shall be considered in fixing the price to be paid for the property. But they are both the same in that their effect is to deprive a citizen of his private property for the benefit of the United States, or such person or corporation as the United States may grant a permit after the expiration of the first one.

I understand from the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—and I desire his attention—that it provides for the valuation of the dams, flowage rights, and transmission lines, to be taken at cost or their depreciated value. Am I correct?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know what the Senator means by "depreciated value." My amendment provides that these particular kinds of properties shall be valued at what they cost, not at what their value may be 50 years from now. Of course, if a dam has been allowed to depreciate in value so that it is tumbling to pieces it would be perfectly unjust to require the Government to pay the cost of it. If it is kept up, that would go into the matter of cost.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the Senator from Montana is right about that, but I did not quite understand the amendment. I will read it again.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to have him address himself, if he proposes to discuss my particular amendment, to the feature that gives me the most concern and the most trouble; that is, the feature of the water rights. I fear that the subject has not had the consideration from the Senator in charge of the bill that it would have had if the representation from the West were greater upon the bill. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has so frequently spoken of the distinction between the right to put in the dam and the right to divert the water from the stream, that I dare say the matter is quite clearly in the mind of the Senator from Tennessee. The right to put in the dam is not enough. One of our people must go, then, and appropriate the water of the stream, so that he may divert it. He gets that water without any cost to himself at all. All he has to do is to make a formal filing of a water right, but after the lapse of 50 years some one else may desire to use that water for the purposes of navigation; he may desire to put it to any other use that he sees fit, but at that time those water rights may be enormously valuable, separate and apart altogether from the question of the dam. In all reasonable probability their value for the purpose of a dam will be greater. It is just possible that a canal might be built and the river turned away through that canal out of its course entirely to develop power at some other place. That water will have a value dependent upon the use to which it can be put. What would the Senator say as to such a case?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator from Montana that that is a subject with which I am not familiar. I know the doctrine of prior appropriation was early applied to water in certain of the Western States—I believe I might describe them as the Rocky Mountain States—by the people who first populated them. That custom grew into law, and was finally recognized by the courts and by legislative enactments; but it has no application to the States east of the Mississippi River nor to those, as I believe, which are bounded on the east by that river, but only to some 11 or 12 mining States and where irrigation is of great value. I have therefore left the consideration of that question to the members of the committee who are familiar with the law of prior appropriation as applicable to those States. That rule, as I have said, does not apply to the States east of the Mississippi River, but the common law applies; that is, that the lower proprietor is entitled to have the water flow onto his premises unpolluted and undiminished save only by what is necessary for ordinary domestic use, and the upper proprietor only has the right to use the water for ordinary purposes. So I am not familiar with the question which the Senator from Montana presents.

Mr. WALSH. But does not the Senator from Tennessee realize that 75 per cent of the power to which this bill will be applied is within the States in which the right of appropriation is recognized? The Geological Survey advise me that, as they are at present informed, probably 3,000,000 horsepower will come under the operation of this act, and that at least 2,000,000 of that is on the Columbia River. The three great sites at The Dalles, at Priest Rapids, and at the international boundary line all fall under the operation of this act, and they amount to more than a million horsepower.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is entirely familiar with those facts. I do understand that about 70 per cent—not 75 per cent—of the water power in the United States is in the Western States; but I further understand that only a small part of it is upon what may be termed navigable rivers.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I am saying to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. And it is only navigable rivers to which this bill applies.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator has not appreciated the point. The fact is that 70 per cent of the power developed under this bill is in that same portion of the country; and I have referred the Senator to three power sites on the Columbia River which will produce more than a million horsepower. You can not develop more than 3,000,000 horsepower under this bill. The power sites in navigable waters of the United States, as I am told by the head of the Geological Survey—that is to say, on rivers that are actually navigated—are limited in number. So that, Mr. President, it becomes exceedingly important to know, when these properties are to be taken over 50 years hence, whether the people at that time will have to pay the value of these water rights or whether they will get them for the actual expenditure incurred in acquiring them.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator and I do not understand the facts in the same way. I get my opinion from the various reports which have been made concerning the possible water-power development in the United States. But that is immaterial. According to the view I take, the rights of the people in the prior-appropriation States are not really different from the rights of the people in the other States. If the company making the development has the water rights which it has acquired and paid for, at the expiration of the term of the permit, when it is forced to part with the property, I believe unquestionably they should be paid just compensation for those rights, just as they should be for every item of value of every particle of property which is taken from them.

Mr. WALSH. I fully agree with the Senator that they ought to have just compensation; but the question is, What is just compensation?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that is a question for the court. It can not be fixed by legislation. That only illustrates the importance of leaving all these questions untrammeled to the courts, which we must all concede have the machinery under which and by which the equities of all parties in all cases can be worked out according to the facts and conditions of each particular case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me the Senator from Tennessee assumes an artificial basis for the argument which he is making. If the Government wants to take the property of a citizen, property which the citizen has acquired entirely apart and independent of the Government, it is overwhelming to say, it is convincing to say, that the Government ought to pay the value of the property as that value would be ascertained in a court; but that is not this case. The Government is to grant a permit or a franchise, or whatever you may be pleased to call it, to a proposed developer of water power. It proposes to give him the permission for 50 years. There is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay him anything for the property after the permission expires; there is no such fundamental obligation as exists——

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator mean that, if the Government takes over the property, it is under no obligation to pay for it?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I said nothing of that kind; but, standing as we now do toward the proposed development of power, the Government is under no obligation to pay for the property after the franchise expires. That is purely a contractual affair. We believe that, in order to induce investment, it is better to agree to pay him something for the property at the end of that time. Now, what we shall agree to pay is purely a matter of contract, and is known to the developer before he enters the stream. If he does not want to build the dam under the agreement which the Government is willing to give him he need not enter the enterprise at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. And he will not.

Mr. CUMMINS. He will enter upon the enterprise if he is assured of a fair profit for his money. Now, let me suggest to the Senator——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator if he would not go further and say, not only assured of a fair profit, but assured that the charges he may make will be sufficient to reimburse him for his capital expenditure?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. He will take that into account, of course. As I said yesterday, there are a thousand corporations now carrying on public utilities under a franchise of no greater period than we propose to grant here, without any agreement to pay for the property at the end of the franchise period.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree with the Senator that capital can be induced to invest in these developments without any agreement for payment for the property at the end of the term, when there may be absolute forfeiture of it, if it is provided in the contract that they shall hold for such time and be allowed to charge the consumer of this day a sum sufficient to pay them a fair return upon the amount they have invested and the capital invested. They will do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Most of the people who will develop water power under this bill will extort all they desire to extort from the people and still recover the exaggerated value of the property as provided in the bill. Now, let me suggest——

Mr. SHIELDS. Then the Senator has no confidence in the State public-service commissions?

Mr. CUMMINS. Most of them will not be under State utility commissions at all. Most of the people who develop these powers, in my judgment, will develop them for profit. They may sell electricity to a city or to a community, but most of the development—I mean now in horsepower—will occur through corporations organized for pecuniary profit to furnish power to the great industrial world. I did not do it yesterday, and before the Senator finishes——

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator intends to take much time I hope he will defer his remarks for the present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the Senator to know another reason why I desire the bill amended in this particular.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have nearly finished, and, if it will take the Senator long, I would rather he would wait, but he may exercise his discretion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to ask the Senator a question. The question is this: Is the Senator insisting upon the payment of intangible value, based upon the business which has been developed by the grantee? The Senator will remember that when the United States Steel Corporation came to buy the Carnegie Steel Co. it paid substantially $500,000,000. The physical property bought was not of greater value at the highest estimate, I believe, than $100,000,000; but the United States Steel Corporation paid the sum I have suggested, simply because the Carnegie Steel Co. had a most profitable business and could pay interest upon $500,000,000. That is just exactly, in my opinion, what will happen to some of the great enterprises which may be developed under this bill. Does the Senator from Tennessee want that kind of value to be attached to the property taken over by the Government?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Tennessee only advocates the payment of a fair value to the investor, and he does that for the purpose of inducing the people who have the money to develop these resources for the benefit of the consumer. The case which the Senator from Iowa puts relates largely to payment for the good will of the company whose property and business were purchased. I do not believe in any case coming under this bill the good will should be valued, because there is no good will when the rates to be charged are regulated and fixed by a service commission or in case of a natural monopoly. The people have no choice but to resort to a company which is a natural monopoly, and this excludes the idea of good will.

Now, let me in this connection call the attention of the Senator to one phase of the question. These permits expire some 50 years hence. The United States may not want to take over the properties and operate them, but either to regrant the permit to the old company or to a new company. The United States, under the Constitution, now can not take them over and operate them for anything but a Federal purpose, such as the manufacture of explosives for military purposes. Therefore it will under the present Constitution, except to a very small extent, be compelled either to renew the permit to the old company or grant it to a new company. If the property of the old company has not been paid for by charges which it has been allowed by the public-service commissions to collect, or if it has received pay for it in that way, would it be right to allow the new company to be benefited by taking over the property of the old company for less than its value, or by the excessive rates that have been wrung from the people in order to amortize the capital of the old company during the life of the permit?

Now, not only may the United States take the property over, but it may give it to a new company upon the same terms, and you are just simply taking the money out of the pockets of the old company, or of the people, and placing it in the hands of a new set of investors.

The Senator from Iowa fully agrees with me that the company gets no property interest in this permit, and that the United States has no property interest in it. On yesterday the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] addressed this inquiry to the Senator from Iowa:

Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what he thinks the grantee under this bill does acquire under the provisions of the bill?

The answer was:

I know that he does not acquire anything except the permission of the Government to obstruct in a certain way the flow of a navigable stream.

And this answer is supported by the fact that that obstruction under this bill must be so constructed as not to interfere with navigation facilities; and, more, it must be made so as to advance those facilities. So it is no obstruction in the sense that one would ordinarily use the term.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I reaffirm the statement that I made yesterday and that the Senator from Tennessee has just read. I do not think the grantee receives very much from the Government under this bill. That is not my objection to the section under consideration. The difficulty is that with a mythical transaction of that sort—almost mythical, because the matter of navigation is so insignificant that it will hardly be remembered——

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him right there, that may be the case in his own State, where he has no navigable waters and no power to be developed; but in other States—for instance, down in Tennessee and Alabama, we have one of the greatest rivers in the United States, the Tennessee, that is navigable, except for certain obstructions in the way of shoals, and with a million or two horsepower water power in it, of great value if we can get a law that will authorize us to utilize it. This is a matter of very great importance to those States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course it is. I did not say it was not a matter of great importance; but any man ought to have a right to go into any stream, so far as the General Government is concerned, and use it in any way he pleases, provided he does not obstruct navigation or impede navigation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unquestionably.

Mr. CUMMINS. All these rules that we have adopted are mere artificial regulations, because the Government has been afraid that if this natural right or privilege were exercised by the citizen the navigation would be in some way impeded or impaired. What I said a moment ago, however, was that the Government of the United States gave to the grantee very little, but upon that little this bill attempts to hang a great obligation upon the part of the Government to buy, as I think, at an exaggerated price, the property at the end of 50 years. If you will take away the obligation which you are attempting to impose upon the Government, then the Senator from Tennessee and myself will have no difference at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I would say to the Senator that if he will read the bill he will see that there is no obligation. It is only when the Government interferes and compels the old company to surrender the property that the Government pays for it. The provision is that the old company may go on with the business and continue it indefinitely, unless the United States interferes and cancels the permit and operates the property or relets it to some one else.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator from Tennessee regard it as a calamity if at the end of 50 years the Government should take the property, pay for it enough to make the grantee whole, and then be able to sell it to another grantee at a higher price than it had paid to the one whose franchise had expired?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would that be a calamity?

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill provides that that can be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would that be a calamity? I should think not. I should think it would be a great advantage to the people of the United States to secure an arrangement of that sort.

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill provides that it can be done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to address a few questions to him.

Mr. SHIELDS. One moment. The Senator from Iowa and myself, as I said, do not disagree in regard to the underlying principles and the law regarding the power of the United States. I should not say "the rights of the United States" or "the interest of the United States," because it merely has a police power over navigable streams and no property interest in them. I call the Senator's attention—and I do it because it expresses it more strongly than I can—to another statement showing that there is no disagreement between us. In his remarks on yesterday the Senator from Iowa said:

I agree, however, that if the grantee is compelled to accumulate during this period a sum that will represent the capital or value of the property at the end of the period, it can only be done through the imposition of such charges to the public as will enable the accumulation to be made; and I, for one, would rather the United States would agree to take the property at the end of the period at a fair value, provided the public has not already paid for it in overcharges or excessive charges, than to allow the grantee to charge those rates that will enable him to accumulate such an amortization fund. So the sole question is, How shall the value of the property be determined?

My objection to the bill as it is begins in line 23, on page 9, in which the property to be valued is described as—

"all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted."

And so forth. My suggestion is, and my amendment proposes, that the word "property" shall be qualified and limited by the insertion of the word "physical."

In reading over the Senator's remarks I gave special attention to that, because I saw that he and I did fully agree that either the company making the development must be allowed to charge such rates as will return to it the capital it has invested, or it must be paid to it at the end of the term by the United States if it takes over the property for operation or to grant to a new permittee. In other words, the company must be allowed to receive back its capital to pay its bondholders, for these large developments are only made by the issuance of bonds.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if it is his view that a State might, if it saw fit to do so, by the exercise of its power of eminent domain, take over this property at the expiration of the 50-year period?

Mr. SHIELDS. A State?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. The State might want to go into the business itself. Could it do so under the right of eminent domain?

Mr. SHIELDS. A State could take over the property in the exercise of its right of eminent domain in order to operate it, provided that that particular State was authorized by its constitution to engage in commerce of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that. I assume that the State is authorized by its constitution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unless this question would bar it; and that is, upon the insistence of the Senator from Montana, among others, a provision is placed in the law permitting the development of these water powers of a contractual nature, giving the United States the right to take the plant at the end of 50 years or any subsequent year. I do not believe that under existing laws the States have a right to condemn the property of the United States; but if you leave out that clause, that control of the United States, that interest which it acquires under the contractual features of the bill, and if the State be authorized to engage in such business, unquestionably it would have a right to do so.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to put to the Senator a case where no public lands are involved at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. Another reason why the States could not do it is on account of its being an improvement to navigation, and, of course, a State can not condemn a Federal utility of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. I am not speaking about that. We get things confused. Of course the State could get the privilege to put a dam in a navigable stream, the same as a private individual. You give the States that power here; but I am assuming that the franchise has expired. It is gone. Could the State condemn the property, acquire the property of the private owner, and then apply to the Government for a franchise to maintain the dam?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. There is no doubt about that, I imagine. If the State did proceed to do so, what would it have to pay, not under the provisions of this bill, but if it went on exercising the right, what would it have to pay?

Mr. SHIELDS. Its fair value; just compensation.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHIELDS. No more and no less.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHIELDS. And that would be settled by the court. That is what this bill provides, and I think it should be left so.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. That is just the point I am trying to make. Inasmuch as the right to maintain the dam in the stream is gone, of course the power company could not get anything for that, if the State condemned.

Mr. SHIELDS. Why, certainly not. There is an express provision on that subject.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. So what are you giving by this bill that the people 50 years from now would not have if you never said a word about it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I can see no application of the Senator's interrogation to any of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Then why does not the Senator just leave it and not say anything at all about the right of recapture? Let the State exercise its right to go in 50 years from now, if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator ask why not strike from this bill the provision for recapture?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Because the Senator from Montana would vote against it?

Mr. WALSH. Oh! That is simply to get my vote?

Mr. SHIELDS. The vote of the Senator from Montana and the votes of other Senators.

Mr. WALSH. Then the Senator from Tennessee does not believe in the wisdom of that provision?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly. I have said so in the remarks I have made to-day.

Mr. WALSH. Oh! That is to say, if the Senator had his way that provision would not be in the bill at all?

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, no; I would put it there.

Mr. WALSH. I mean the Senator would put it there merely to get votes for the bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. I favor a 50-year limit upon these companies and have given my reasons why I do so.

Mr. WALSH. But, as I say, the Senator would put it there merely to get votes for the bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I put it there because I favored it; but the Senator asks me why not strike it out, and I say I would lose his vote and many others if I did.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. REED. On the point which has been raised I want to get the Senator's view.

Suppose, at the end of 50 years, the period having arrived when the franchise is to be terminated, a State having the authority to acquire a public utility should undertake to condemn and take over the plant, could the State condemn and take over the franchise right which had been granted by the United States Government?

Mr. SHIELDS. The difference between the Senator and myself is that I do not think the United States grants any franchise right. It just gives a permit, under its police power, for the owner of property to use it.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator does not think this is a contract with the United States at all?

Mr. SHIELDS. That does not follow from what I have said.

Mr. REED. I am asking this question because I really want to get the Senator's view, and not at all in a controversial spirit.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will gladly give the Senator my views about it.

Mr. REED. No matter what term we use, anything is a franchise which——

Mr. SHIELDS. I think I can answer the Senator directly. I think I understand him better than I did. It is my opinion, as a lawyer, that any State having the power under its constitution to use the property for any purpose would have the right to condemn every possible interest in it that the company has, where not prevented by the interest of the United States, either in the exercise of its police power over the river or by contract under this statute and the permit granted.

Mr. REED. I think I understand the Senator, but I want to be sure, because I think there possibly is a very great danger in this bill at this point. The Senator has given the question great thought and attention, and I have not.

Assume that a corporation gets a franchise to build a dam across the Mississippi River. For 50 years it has the right to maintain that dam. It has also built various works and plants and created other properties in connection with its dam. At the end of that period of 50 years a State having the right under its laws and constitution to acquire a public utility proceeds to undertake to take over this dam and also the permit—the franchise, I call it—of the Federal Government to maintain the dam. Now, can the State, under the terms of this bill, succeed to that right which the Government granted and condemn that right, which comes from the Federal Government, in a proceeding against the corporation?

Mr. SHIELDS. It can condemn every possible interest in the property vested in the permittee, tangible and intangible, real, personal, and mixed. There is no species of property that can escape the power of eminent domain.

Mr. REED. But can the power of eminent domain of a State extend to the condemnation and taking over of a power which is vested in the United States Government and in which the United States Government is supreme? Does it go that far?

Mr. SHIELDS. I doubt that.

Mr. REED. Therefore I doubt the right of the State, unless it is plainly written in this bill, to condemn and to acquire this property and to operate it in the same way that the corporation can, namely, under a grant by the United States Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should be very glad to put in such a provision. I have no objection to it. Further, I would agree to a provision, both in the public-lands bill and in this bill, that any State may condemn the property of the United States—I mean the public domain—but that would take legislation of special character extending the right of eminent domain. Congress could grant that power to the States.

Mr. REED. I think it could be granted in this bill. I think there could be a clause written in this bill that in the event of a State taking over this property it should succeed to the grant given by the United States. By putting that in this bill we would clear up what I think might be a troublesome matter. I am not fighting this bill. I am suggesting, as I say, a thing that I think is troublesome.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think so; but it would probably defeat the bill if it was done. There are not many Senators who agree with me in this matter.

Mr. REED. Certainly no Senator ought to vote against it on that ground. Now, while I have the floor I want to ask the Senator if it is his purpose in this bill to grant a perpetual right upon these streams?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. Have we not done that when we have provided that a corporation can occupy a stream for 50 years, and then at the end of that period of 50 years the United States can only acquire the property by paying for its value? We have put in no provision to terminate the rights of the company. In other words, is this not what we do by the bill: The company exists for 50 years without the right of the Government to purchase. At the end of the 50 years the Government can terminate the rights of the company only upon condition that it shall pay for the property its full value. Is not that practically a perpetual franchise?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. It would seem to me that that is in effect a perpetual franchise. However, I do not want to interrupt the Senator further on that point. I may have something to say about it later.

Mr. SHIELDS. When the Government in the permit reserves the power to terminate it at a certain time, it seems to me, it is impossible to construe it to be a perpetuity. Again, this bill contains a section expressly providing for amendment or repeal of its provisions at any time. Another reason why it could not be a perpetuity, which the Senator will recognize and concede when I call it to his attention, is that the sole power the Federal Government has over rivers, and the sole power of Congress to enact this legislation, is the police power or function of controlling or regulating navigation on the rivers, a governmental function which it can not surrender.

Mr. REED. If that be correct in the broad way that I understand the Senator to state the proposition, we get to this: We propose to grant a right for 50 years which is granted under the police powers of the Government, and we can not grant away our police powers at all, says the Senator; and therefore the grant for 50 years is null and void upon its face, because you can not grant away a police power. Surely I misunderstood the Senator, but that is the way I did understand him.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator controvert the proposition that the Government can not grant away its police powers in perpetuity, or surrender a governmental function?

Mr. REED. Oh, I do not controvert the fact that the Government can not surrender its governmental functions; but when you ask me whether the Government of the United States may not grant a privilege for a fixed term, I doubt the negative of that. I think it can grant a right for a fixed term.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, I see that the Senator's point is that even for the 50 years it would be a limited surrender of the police function.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is approaching now not only the infirmity of all legislation of this kind but the monstrous proposition that is put forward by such legislation, to interfere with property private rights along rivers, riparian rights, and to hamper the owners in the improvement and utilization of them under the bare police power to regulate commerce. I do not know of anything that is worse blackmail than for the Federal Government, through the Congress, to demand that these riparian proprietors shall surrender their rights, in whole or in part, for the mere permission to exercise them in such a way that they do not interfere with the police power of Congress to protect navigation in the river.

The Congress, after conceding the powers of the State governments and the right of the riparian proprietors for a hundred years, in 1890 and 1899, broadly prohibited the States and the riparian proprietors from putting any obstruction in a navigable stream, regardless of whether it affected navigation or not. That statute, to my mind, ought to be repealed. I believe it is unconstitutional. There is no question but that Congress has the power, when regulating transportation upon navigable rivers, to say what is an obstruction in that particular river; and Congress frequently did say so, and had dams and other obstructions that were placed in such rivers by States or by riparian proprietors removed prior to the act of 1899.

Mr. REED. Of course, on the broad question of bad laws or what are thought to be bad, I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Those are the laws which have made it necessary to enact this legislation.

Mr. REED. Some have been bad. The Senator is trying to remedy one of them by this bill; but in seeking to remedy the present bad law it is not necessary to make this law either bad or dangerous.

I do not want to take the Senator's time, but rather to bring to a close what I was trying to say by way of a question. My view of the matter is that this bill ought to be so drawn that there would be no doubt of the right of the State, under its power of eminent domain, to acquire all of the property at the end of the 50-year period and to exercise the full right of running it. I mean by that to acquire such rights as the Federal Government has granted to the individual or corporate owner of the dam.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to what occurred in the consideration of this bill in the committee. Originally we put in the bill "State, municipality, or other subdivisions of the State," but the permittee under the bill is in various ways made subject to the orders and regulations of the Secretary of War concerning the navigation facilities furnished, and further, the permittee, for a violation of those rules and regulations or any of the provisions of this bill, is made subject to a high misdemeanor.

If the Senator's State should condemn the right of the permittee and take over this property under a provision that he suggests, it would be, I think, subject to the orders of the Secretary of War. Does the Senator want to place his State in that humiliating position? I did not want to place my State in it, and I called the situation to the attention of the committee, and they agreed with me that it ought to be stricken out. The committee all agreed that whenever a State wished to obstruct a river by building a dam in it for a public-utility purpose and presented a proper case Congress would without hesitation grant the permit. In that way the States can go into the business of generating hydroelectricity, and if they have that right they can condemn every possible interest not controlled by Congress that the grantee has in the property. I think there is no question about it.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me a further interruption, of course the fact that the bill carries criminal penalties against individuals who may obstruct a stream affords no insuperable objection to the granting of a right to a State or a municipality to conduct such business, because the Government can be well protected against them by a simple provision that when a dam is owned by any municipality or any State government, and it is violating the law, the Federal Government can take possession of the property and can remove the obstruction.

The fact that we can not make a criminal penalty apply to every concern is not very important. Besides, I hold that the criminal penalty in itself is an unimportant thing; that the real protection lies in the power of the Government to remove the dam or to take possession of it, and to manage it properly and in the public interest.

Now, since I made a remark a moment ago to the effect that I thought certain things ought to exist after 50 years, and in order that the RECORD may be complete as to what I meant to say, I desire to further state that I believe the right of the Government or of the municipality or of a State to take over the property and pay proper compensation ought to exist at all times during the 50-year franchise. I do not believe in the granting of any franchise or any right on great navigable streams that can not be terminated by the Government or by the State at any time upon paying proper compensation. That is the modern theory upon which practically every franchise is now being drawn. If we are not very careful, we are going to by this bill create 50-year franchises that will mean 50 years of trouble.

Mr. SHIELDS. The question raised by the Senator, of course, is not directed to the amendment, and the discussion has led far afield from it. I did not know there was any State that wanted a franchise of this kind. If the Senator feels that his State is interested and will present an amendment, the committee will give it that consideration which any suggestion he makes is always entitled to and always receives.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this is rather a new question. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he believes a State could under any process whatever, condemnation or otherwise, condemn and take control of a dam constructed in a river for the purpose of providing navigation in that stream? Does he think the State could do that?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say that if the Senator had noticed the statement I made in answer to the Senator from Missouri, he would have had an answer to his question. I said the State could only condemn the interest of the company owning the property, that it could not condemn any interest or right or power the United States had in it. It can not condemn the navigation facilities made under the direction of the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know that is the Senator's position, but I asked that question with a view of asking him another. Why would the State want to condemn the property of any company and take it over and pay for it with the knowledge in front of them that the Government of the United States might at any time it chose order the dam to be torn out of the river? Of what value would the property be and what price would the Senator think they would pay?

Mr. SHIELDS. I presume the Senator addresses his interrogatory to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I should like to have the Senator from Missouri answer it.

Mr. REED. That is a very apt statement of my position that the bill ought to contain express language to the effect that if any State or municipality does condemn and take over the physical properties the grantee may have in any navigable stream it shall thereupon succeed to all the rights of the grantee to maintain the same under the grant of the Federal Government. If you should not put that in this bill there would be the very question that the Senator has raised constantly before us.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, the Senator from Missouri seems to think the Government of the United States may transfer its right or its duty, if you prefer that term, to protect navigation to a State, and say to the State you must take this navigation the same as I have agreed to do. But a little later on the Secretary of War concludes, for a good reason, for instance, the commerce on a river might increase to such an extent, that there would be no surplus; it would take all the water which would be available and leave no surplus for power, so that he would say, "Your dam is an obstruction to navigation, and therefore you must take it out, or you must try to turn the water off your wheels in order that we may have plenty of water for navigation."

Mr. REED. The difference between the Senator and myself is that he can see how the Government can grant rights to a private corporation but he can not see how the Government could give the same rights to a State. If the Government can give a right to a private corporation to build a dam to use the water of a river in a certain way, then the Government can give exactly the same kind of a right to a State, and subject to the same limitations and powers and rights of the Federal Government the State can exercise that which the individual could.

It may be that the Senator and I are differing because of a misunderstanding. First, the bill was drawn so that a municipality or a State could take over the property of a private corporation, and should have the same right to maintain the property that the private corporation would have had it continued in possession of it; and I think that ought to be clearly put in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no difference between the Senator and myself on that question; but he has not answered the question I asked him. I want to know what would happen with this provision if the State had taken it over and you put your mills there for the purpose of operating them for power. I ask what he thinks would happen in case the Secretary of War, acting for the Government of the United States, after the State had taken it over and the dam had been constructed, concluded that it was obstructing navigation because there was not sufficient water to operate navigation and at the same time furnish power, and therefore was an obstruction? The dam must be removed under the provisions of this bill; but what would happen then?

Mr. REED. The same thing would happen that ought to and would happen to a private corporation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. I would much rather it would happen to a corporation than to a State.

Mr. REED. A private corporation is not going to invest its money until upon an examination it has found that it is reasonably safe to invest its money, and a State will not condemn and take over the property until it has found that it is reasonably safe to take over the property.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But, Mr. President, the State can not tell what is going to happen in 25 or 30 or 50 years, in that respect.

Mr. REED. No; we can not tell what will happen in 25 or 30 years. The State can not tell; the municipality can not tell, nor the private corporation. I am assuming that if you give a State the naked right to acquire a piece of property it will not acquire that piece of property under such circumstances as will involve it in loss. Of course, if you start with the assumption that the governors of States and the representatives of municipalities are not capable of managing the affairs of the State or the municipality, and therefore will make all sorts of bad bargains and buy property that would be obsolete as a workable piece of property, then you ought to put an amendment to all our constitutions providing that the States should buy nothing and municipalities should never acquire a plant. But if we give to these municipalities the right to acquire, which the bill undertakes to do, then we ought to give them the right to acquire the privileges and franchises the Government has granted, so that they will succeed to them and occupy a position exactly similar to the one occupied by the private corporation.

Mr. SHIELDS. I again ask the Senator to prepare an amendment and present it to the committee, and not oppose the bill simply because of an omission of what he thinks is necessary.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is impossible to provide in one measure for every contingency that may happen in regard to the subject legislated upon.

I must request Senators not to interrupt me in matters not relating to the subject of the amendment I am discussing. Of course, I will be glad to answer any question in regard to it, but I must get through at some time.

Another reason why I think it is difficult to fix the exact measure of the value of the property in the bill instead of leaving the question to the Secretary of War and the company to settle, or, upon their failure to do so, to the courts of the country, is whether the dam and other parts of the plant were properly constructed. The Government ought not to be responsible for a mistake the engineers may make in construction. I will call the Senator's attention to a concrete case, the Hales Bar Dam in Tennessee. The original estimate was that it would cost $3,000,000, but, largely on account of a mistake of the engineers in the boring for the foundation of the dam, it was discovered that that estimate was entirely too small. The dam eventually cost $9,000,000. This shows why the value of all this property ought to be left to the company and the Secretary of War or to the courts to settle, and that only its fair value ought to be allowed.

There are many cases in which it may happen that the property is not worth what it cost, because of a bad contract, inevitable accident, or misfortune attending the construction, for which the Government is not responsible and should not pay the consequent loss.

In one of the cases I read it is said that the fairest rule is that which applies to the exercise of the right of eminent domain. I think that would be the best, and that under that rule the fair value of the property at the time it is condemned should be paid, and nothing more and nothing less.

The amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] contains these words:

> Nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances.

Does the Senator mean to exclude those from consideration?

Mr. WALSH. That is qualified by the language which immediately follows.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not think that that is what was meant.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not.

Mr. SHIELDS. With all due respect, I do not think the amendment is quite so clear as the Senator would have drawn it had he been in his office and had a little more time. It is not as clear as papers ordinarily prepared by him are.

The next portion of the sentence is:

> Or the land on which the same may be situated beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation.

The Senator would not only require the depreciation of the machinery but also that of the land to be deducted.

Mr. WALSH. I would not think the depreciation would have any reference to land.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hardly thought the Senator meant that. He did not intend to allow depreciation in the value of the land in ascertaining its value and then cut off all allowance for appreciation, as the next part of the sentence does.

Mr. WALSH. There would not be any appreciation in value of the land.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think there would generally be very little depreciation or appreciation.

Mr. WALSH. The depreciation would refer, of course, to the generating works and diversion works.

Mr. SHIELDS. But it does cover land, as written here. I was simply asking to get what the Senator meant by it.

> Nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired.

The water rights, of course, would be dependent upon the laws of the States where the company was located. If that is intended to cover the flowage rights, the riparian rights, generally, as it would as left here, of course that would be wrong. The company buys these flowage rights and pays for them, and if the United States gets the benefit of them, it ought to pay for them; or if any company to whom the permit is transferred gets the benefit of them, it ought to pay for them.

Mr. WALSH. For the information of the Senator I will say that the flowage rights and the water rights are quite distinct things.

Mr. SHIELDS. In other words, the Senator means they are in his State and in the Western States.

Mr. WALSH. Wherever the term "water rights" is used.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is a technical term in the Western States, but it has a different meaning entirely in the Eastern States.

Mr. WALSH. Under the State law of appropriation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; and this bill was intended to cover all States.

Mr. President, the development of water power for the generation of hydroelectricity is a business proposition, generally involving an investment of many millions of dollars, furnished, as a rule, by numerous and widely scattered parties purchasing the bonds of the company. If these developments are obtained, and it is conceded they can not be under the present laws, they must be considered as business propositions, and the statutes enacted to make them possible must be reasonable and just to the investors.

The terms of the grant must be such as to pay for or justify the hazard of the project, the organization expenses—which in great corporations is no small sum—the loss of interest during construction and while awaiting a market, which often amounts to a very large sum. The Keokuk Dam and Hales Bar projects were several years in construction, and the interest on the money borrowed for that purpose amounted to an enormous sum. Also there must be an allowance for interest on the indebtedness while a market is being secured for the product. In every case where developments have been made there was comparatively a small market for the product in the beginning, and none of them, so far as I know, now have a market that consumes their entire output.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Assuming the power of regulation to exist as to all this development—of course, as to most of them it would not exist at all, but assuming that it existed as to all—would not those elements be taken care of in fixing the rates? Would not the commission in fixing the rates that could be charged for power recognize that for several years it would be necessary to make a considerable allowance?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, they ought to take that into account. That is what I am referring to.

Mr. WALSH. So would not all those things be taken care of during the whole 50 years of the franchise?

Mr. SHIELDS. That would entirely depend on the rates allowed.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHIELDS. But those things, in my opinion, ought to be amortized, and I have said nothing to the contrary.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator that they ought to be taken care of in current rates. Why does the Senator urge that they should be paid for again at the end of the period?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has not urged any such thing. My observations have been general.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator to mean that in considering the amount which should be paid for the property at the end of the period you should take into consideration the fact——

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is mistaken. I was not referring to that matter at all in the observation I was making, but it was a general observation as to what had to be considered and the rights of the investors.

Mr. WALSH. I wholly misapprehended the tenor of the Senator's remarks, because I supposed he was addressing himself to the general amount that ought to be paid at the expiration of the period.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no way to compel those who have money to invest it in water-power developments, and they will always prefer other investments so long as their rights in the former are not fully protected. The construction of these plants is costly and the business hazardous from floods and many other natural causes, all of which must be taken into consideration.

There are few who do not concede that taxes, tolls, and rents which may be imposed upon water-power development by the Federal Government will ultimately be paid by the consumer, for they will be taken into consideration by the public service corporations fixing and regulating the rates of consumers.

The deductions that may be made from the value of the property when it is taken over will as certainly be paid by the consumer.

It presents a case similar to that of a municipality owing a public debt, where a sinking-fund tax is levied in order to create a fund to pay the bonds at maturity.

If the rules for the valuation of the property advocated in these amendments be carried into this law, the company making the investment will, from the very beginning, be compelled to charge greater rates than they otherwise would, and the public-service commissions will be compelled to allow them to do so, in order to anticipate such losses and realize the value of their property that will be thus confiscated by the Government.

This is all to be done for the benefit of the people who may inhabit the country 50 years hence. I want to inquire if the Senators have not some consideration for the people who are here now, and I ask upon what principle of justice can they justify their action in placing such a burden upon them?

Will they in their great tenderness for future generations write into this law such provisions as will make it ineffective and inoperative and defeat the development of these resources so much needed by the present generation for manufacturing purposes. I believe in having some regard for the rights of the people we now represent, and let the representatives of future generations take care of their constituents.

The consumers' rights and interests should have our first care in formulating this law. They want and their interest requires the development of these great natural resources.

They have not the money to develop them. They can not get investors to do it without protection to their property rights.

They want the power furnished as cheaply as possible, and this they can not obtain if the investors are compelled to collect from them in rates and charges, not only a fair return upon the capital they invest, but the corpus of the capital itself, all within this limited time.

It is clear to my mind that these amendments are impracticable and that they will deter and drive away investors. The bill provides a plain, businesslike method for the settlement and ascertainment of the value of the property. It provides that it may be agreed upon by the company and the Secretary of War, and upon failure of such agreement, by a court of equity. I have every confidence that the courts of the country will do the people justice. I have every confidence in the ability of a court of equity to ascertain all facts and settle all equities in accordance with the common justice which ought to be meted out in every case.

In conclusion, I wish to call attention to another utterance of Mr. Garrison in regard to this same matter, made before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Secretary Garrison said:

> In a general way, this can be said, however: The subject of recapture is one of tremendous importance, both to the public and to the grantee. It must be governed by principles in which business considerations and justice enter in a marked degree. There must be provided a means whereby the sovereign, or one authorized thereto by the sovereign, may be permitted to take over the rights, the plant, and business of the grantee upon or after the expiration of the grant, on terms that are both feasible and just. Of course, what we are seeking to do is to be just to the grantee and also just to the public. The subject is of such importance because of what it involves—the rights of property of the individual and the rights of the people in a common resource. We can not properly contemplate benefiting the latter by an unjust injury to the former. As I said the other day, "The rights of property of the grantee upon and after the expiration of the definite tenure should be defined, and the rights and property held thereunder should be protected by continuing them until renewed in the original grantee or taken over by the United States or by authority of the United States, upon terms of fair compensation."
> Anything further that I might say at this time would merely be in amplification of my previous statement. Of course, that which the Government grants must not be included in the assessment of fair compensation, but outside of this I do not see how Congress can usefully or wisely enumerate what shall be comprised within that term. It must depend upon so many at present indeterminable factors, and must depend so largely upon the situation in each particular case.
> It does not seem to me that Congress is called upon, in dealing with this subject matter, to attempt to be any more specific than are the constitutions of the various States concerning the taking of private property for public use. In almost every one of those constitutions language of similar meaning is used. My recollection is that they usually read "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation." What is just compensation, "just" being practically synonymous with "fair" compensation, in each case depends upon, first, the judgment of the commission appointed on behalf of the public to condemn the land, and, secondly, upon the final determination of the courts in reviewing the decision of the initial condemnors. That is exactly the situation which I think that Congress should consider and deal with in this matter. They provide for the taking of private property for public use. They provide that it shall not be taken without just or fair compensation being paid, and they provide, in the first instance, that it shall be determined by an administrator or executive officer, and that subsequently his decision may be reviewed and the final question settled by the appropriate legal tribunals. It would be, in my view, as I have so frequently said, a practically impossible thing and a very unwise thing to attempt to be specific with respect to this matter, excepting to the extent of positively providing that no element of value shall be attributed to that which the Government has granted to the licensee.

Mr. President, what I insist on in this case is that these amendments are wholly unnecessary to do justice between the United States and the permittee. The bill as written provides that upon the termination of the lease and the taking over of the property for the use of the United States or for any other permittee to whom it may grant it, the fair value shall be paid, excluding that of the permit which, of course, will have expired at that time or when the United States gives notice that it will exercise its option. These amendments only undertake to impart—because they can not possibly contemplate what will be all the elements of value 50 years hence—to fix the measure or rule of ascertaining the value of the property. The machinery of courts of equity is ample; it is broad, and it is effective; and what may be the value to-day may not be the value 20 years from now. In 20 years from now there may be values that are not considered or recognized to-day. The rules of the court will be adjusted to conditions as they then exist, and will in every case do what is fair and what is just.

I insist, Mr. President, that the bill as it is written is in better shape, that it is more practicable, and that it is fairer than any of these amendments, and therefore they ought to be rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, inasmuch as the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee have been directed to some extent to amendments offered by me, I desire to say a word or two.

I appreciate that no value attaches to anything that is said in this discussion, except such as comes from the value of the remarks of any Senator in the RECORD. However, there are abundant reasons why those having views on this all-important feature of the bill should take occasion to express them.

This feature of the bill deals with a valuable right supposed to be created by it—the right on the part of the Government to take over the property of the grantee at the end of the period when the permit expires. The Government then becomes reinvested with the right to control the stream, as it had it at the beginning; but, of course, that right would be valueless without having at once the property through which that right is made serviceable; and the bill properly provides for the taking over of the property.

But, Mr. President, on the plain admissions of the Senator from Tennessee these elaborate provisions of the bill mean absolutely nothing. They grant to the people no right whatever that would not exist if the bill were entirely silent upon the question with which these features deal. The term of the lease has expired; the grantee has no longer any privilege of occupying the navigable stream with the dam; the property, its diversion works, the generating works, the transmission lines, and all other property which it has acquired is valueless to it, or to a very great extent it is valueless, except as it can be used in connection with the privilege to occupy the navigable stream.

Under those circumstances, beyond cavil and beyond question, the State could condemn the property of the grantee and take possession of it. Then Congress could invest it either by an act then passed or by this very bill, if it shall be amended as suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Montana did not understand that I controverted that, did he?

Mr. WALSH. That is the point I am telling the Senate, that the Senator from Tennessee agrees that that is the case. Nobody can dispute it. In that case the State would be required to pay the then fair value of the property, just exactly as provided in this bill; in other words, the right would then exist to take over the property by paying its fair value; and it is not necessary to make any provision with respect to that matter in this bill at all, if that is the policy that is to be pursued.

Of course, Mr. President, the bill gives to the Government of the United States the contractual right to take over the property upon exactly the same terms as the State would be entitled to get it if it exercised the right of eminent domain. It may be fairly open to question as to whether or not the Government of the United States, without the contractual right granted to it by this bill, would not be entitled to take over the property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain which it possesses. I imagine there can be no question that, if the Government went into the improvement of the navigation of the river, it would be entitled to exercise the right of eminent domain in connection with that improvement; and if the development of power was incidental to that, it doubtless would have the right to exercise the power of eminent domain so as to utilize the power which it developed. That may, however, be open to question, and I do not care to debate or discuss it now.

The bill, Mr. President, only gives to the United States the very rights that the State would have if there was nothing in this bill at all. Therefore, Mr. President, why are these provisions here? The Senator says practically to get votes. That is to say——

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator said that it was put in the bill because he could not get my vote if it was not there.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; I did say that. But I had previously stated that I believed in the 50-year limit and gave the reasons why I believed in it. I told the Senator that I believed in it, and the Senator remarked, "Why did you put it in?" And facetiously I simply stated "to get the Senator's vote," because I knew the Senator favored such an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, the Senator from Tennessee believed that he might be able to get my vote by a provision in this bill which gives absolutely no privilege that the people would not have the right to exercise at the end of the 50-year period.

Mr. SHIELDS. I made no such statement as a fact. I did not put in the provision to get the Senator's vote. I believe in it myself, and every member of the committee believes in it. I do not know a Senator, unless it is the Senator from Washington, who does not believe in a limitation; and in my address this evening I have given my reasons for it. I would be far from thinking that I could get the Senator's vote by any trick. I do not think there is a Senator on this floor whose vote could be procured in that way; and, even if it was, I want the Senator to know—and I believe he does know—that I would not resort to a trick to get a vote.

Mr. WALSH. I am very sure the Senator would not. I shall take the Senator's own statement.

Mr. SHIELDS. If these provisions, however, amount to nothing why does the Senator consume so much time in assailing them and trying to amend them?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator's talk is perfectly aside from the question. I was not debating with him at all the question as to whether there should be a limitation of 50 years or not; that is not the question we are talking about. Everybody feels that there should be a limitation of 50 years. The question we are talking about is what amount should be paid by the Government at the end of the time in order to recover the property.

I want to treat the Senator from Tennessee with perfect fairness, and I was endeavoring to discuss this bill on that basis. I asked him if it were not the fact that the people at the end of the 50-year period would have the right to take over this property by paying for it just what the bill provides shall be paid for it; in other words, whether it is not a fact that the bill confers on the people no right whatever so far as taking over the property at the end of the 50-year period is concerned, and so far as the amount to be paid for it is concerned, that would not exist in the people without the bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is not the fact. I will state the fact to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. In what respect is it not a fact?

Mr. SHIELDS. That was what I proposed to state. The bill makes a difference between what would be the case in the absence of this provision and the presence of it. It is this: If there was no provision for taking over the property, it would have to be condemned. The United States, for a public purpose authorized by the Constitution, has the power to condemn property, but in doing so it must pay just compensation for it, and every element of value must be considered. Under this bill, however, the United States may take it over without resort to a condemnation proceeding, by agreement between the Secretary of War and the company, at any time it may give notice after the expiration of 50 years; and if the company and the Secretary do not agree on the value, then jurisdiction is given to the courts to settle it, and, as I believe, under the provisions of the bill, to settle it under what would be the rule applied in a condemnation proceeding.

The bill does more. The United States would only have a right to take it over for a public purpose under the law, while under this bill it may take it over and grant a new permit to any other company or individual. That is not a public purpose, but the United States would have a right to force the Senator, if he owned one of these developments, to surrender his property that it might let me have it. These are very material differences between the exercise of the right of eminent domain and the contractual features of this bill, and they are valuable, because the United States does not wish to destroy the development or the property of the development company; it only wants to control the property in the interest of the consumer, and, if for some reason, it thinks the original permittee is not a good party to operate the plant, because perhaps its past record is not good, or for any other reason, and it desires to have it transferred to a new permittee, the provision of the bill authorizes that, and in many cases it may be beneficial to the Government and people to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. President, it is quite obvious that no good can be achieved by the further pursuit of any colloquy on this subject with the Senator from Tennessee. I assert, then, upon my own responsibility, Mr. President, that this bill gives to the Government, representing the people, the right to take over the property at the end of the 50-year period. I assert, sir, that the people already have that right and that they may exercise it under the power of eminent domain. The bill gives the right to take that property over upon the payment of its fair value at the expiration of the 50-year period, and I assert that that gives no privilege or right to the people which they do not already have, because at the end of that time if they took it over that would be the amount which they would be obliged to pay for it if they exercised the right of eminent domain to take it over.

The Senator now says that a further right is given—namely, that the Government may turn it over to some one else. If, Mr. President, the State has the right to exercise the power of eminent domain and to take over the property and itself operate it, it has a right subsequently to change its mind about it and lease it or turn it over to some one else. So that I assert, sir, there is no right given, and this provision in this bill means absolutely nothing.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I want to discuss that upon the basis of the reason for it. If the theory of the Senator from Tennessee is correct—that we are giving absolutely nothing to the grantee by this bill—if that is a sound view to take of this proposed law, then he is right about it that we should exact nothing from the corporation either now or at the end of the 50 years in consideration of whatever grant it gets by this bill. That argument, Mr. President, was made the other day and is made again now by the Senator from Tennessee in opposition to the provision of an amendment offered requiring an annual royalty to be paid, an annual charge to be paid, for the privilege exercised. To use his language, to exact an annual charge for the privilege extended is blackmail of the worst sort. Of course, if nothing is granted it is blackmail; but what is the fact? Upon what theory is this bill framed? It is framed upon the theory that by virtue of this provision a privilege of the very highest value is extended to the grantee, and that he ought to return to the Government something in consideration of the privilege which it extends to him.

Let me call your attention to the fact that the bill provides, on page 4, that the Secretary of War may make one of the conditions of the permit:

(a) That such grantee shall, to the extent necessary to preserve navigation facilities at least equivalent to those existing prior to the construction of such dam, construct, in whole or in part, without expense to the United States, in connection with any such dam a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or other structures for navigation purposes, in accordance with plans, specifications, and conditions approved by the Secretary of War and made a part of such permit.

Bear in mind, Mr. President and Senators, "navigation facilities at least equivalent to those existing prior to the construction," and so on; and how much more the Secretary of War may require that the grantee shall expend in this work for the public benefit is entirely within his own discretion.

On the walls of this Chamber is a plat showing the development of the Coosa River in the State of Alabama—a contemplated work which I most sincerely trust will be rapidly carried on to completion—from which it appears that it is contemplated that the grantee of any privilege to dam that stream will be required by the Government to expend an enormous amount of money, not for his own benefit, not in order that he may develop more power, but solely for the purpose of aiding navigation in the river; and we are told by the esteemed Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that they are going to require of whoever undertakes this development that he spend something like $800,000, the expenditure of which he might otherwise avoid, purely to help out navigation; in other words, he is going to be required to pay the equivalent of $800,000 into the Treasury of the United States for the privilege which he gets.

Mr. President, what is the difference between that and requiring him to pay an annual charge of so much into the Treasury of the United States for the privilege he enjoys? Let me go on. Turn to page 5 of the bill, and you will find that the Secretary of War may include in the permit a condition "that such grantee shall furnish free of cost power for the operation of the same."

If you make him pay an annual royalty into the Treasury for the power he develops, you perpetrate blackmail in the most pronounced form; but if you make him furnish power to the Government free, there is no exception taken to it at all. Why, Mr. President, what is the difference, if he pays royalty into the Treasury upon the amount of power which he produces and then the Treasury pays him for whatever the Government uses in operating the canal?

Let me go a little further. Turn to section 3 (c) of the bill:

> That in case such navigation facilities shall not be made a part of such original construction at the expense of the grantee, then, whenever the United States shall deem such navigation facilities necessary the grantee shall convey to the United States free of cost—

Free of cost, mind you—

> such of its land and its right of way, and permit such control of pools as may be required for such navigation facilities, and shall furnish free of cost power for the operation of the same.

It makes him give up to the Government, in order to carry on its work of improving the river, land for which he paid money. It requires the company to furnish power to the Government in order to operate the navigation facilities which it provides.

Turn over to page 8. There it is provided that the Secretary of War may make rules and regulations under which the property is to be operated, and these rules and regulations may—> include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and such other lights and signals and such fishways as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

He is obliged to spend money in order to put those in. Now, what does all this mean? Upon what principle can you require him to spend millions, perhaps, for purposes that are entirely unrelated to the production of power, and that are simply for the benefit of the people of the United States? Why, it is done upon the proposition that we are granting him a valuable privilege in permitting him to block up the navigable stream with his dam, and that he ought to pay for it, and it is simply a question as to how much he ought to pay; that is all.

Mr. President, if we were giving nothing whatever to the permittee, if indeed it were blackmail to require him to pay anything for this privilege, either directly or indirectly, of course we could not ask him at the end of this period to surrender his property except upon the payment, under the provisions of the Constitution, of just compensation for it, which would be its value at that time. That is not the situation, however. We are making a bargain with him now. We are making a contract with him now. We say: "We are giving you a valuable privilege. We could get this property from you at the end of the 50-year period, without any concessions from you, by the exercise of the power of eminent domain for the fair value of it; but we are contracting with you now, and we want something that is a little better than that."

That is the situation of affairs. We are not depriving anybody of property without due process of law. We are not taking private property for public use without just compensation. We are trying to make a contract under which we shall get something more than we would be entitled to get if we did not have any contract at all.

Mr. President, in the course of the discussion by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] quotations were made from some distinguished publicists canvassing this subject, from which the impression would naturally be gained that practically all of them agree that the fair-value test, and not the cost test, is the one that is to be applied when the Government takes over this property at the end of the 50-year period. Secretary Lane ought to be regarded as a pretty reliable authority upon this subject, not only because of the earnest consideration which he has given to this subject ever since he came into office, not only by reason of the fact that he has consulted and advised with the profoundest thinkers upon this question in this and in other countries since taking office, but furthermore, because he was compelled to deal with this and with related questions during his long and his honorable service upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. What does he say about this?

I read from a letter that he addressed to the Senate Committee on Public Lands on the public-lands bill a year ago, telling his views about the features of legislation of this kind. I read from page 6 of the hearings on the water-power bill before the Senate committee in 1914:

> 4. That at the end of the 50-year period and after not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right to take over the properties, upon condition that it pay the actual cost of rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests therein purchased and used by the lessee in the generation and distribution of power under the lease and the reasonable valuation of all other property taken over, excluding, however, franchise values, good will, or other intangible elements.

The amendment which we are considering announces exactly that principle, except that no specific reference is made to intangible values, good will, and value as a going concern.

In his testimony before the committee—I read from page 301 of the same hearings—Secretary Lane said:

> And I think I have explained myself fully as to why I think that the words "actual cost" are vital. I would not give my approval to a measure which struck out the words "actual cost" and substituted the words "fair value" in that connection.

I read from page 315:

> Mr. RAKER. The Secretary made it plain, but I did not quite get his idea in connection with the turning over of the property after the 50-year period. Was it your view, Mr. Secretary, after the 50-year period, that when the Government takes over the property all the water rights, rights of way, and additional property that has been purchased by these individuals or corporations should be taken over at the cost that was originally paid for the plant?
> Secretary LANE. Precisely.
> Mr. RAKER. And for the property?
> Secretary LANE. Yes.

Then, again:

> Mr. RAKER. Suppose there was not any fraud—suppose the parties say the plant is worth $100,000 and the plant has been established?
> Secretary LANE. I have no objection to a modification which will pay actual cost but not to exceed a fair value.

Reference was made to what was said by the distinguished head of the Geological Survey, Mr. George Otis Smith. I read from his testimony on that point, found on page 350 of these hearings. He says:

> I believe with you on the question of whether fair values should be substituted for actual cost; I believe the question comes right down, as the chairman suggested, to whether the stockholders of a power-development company, who have been running for 50 years, shall secure the benefit of that increase in land values or whether the community at large should secure it. I believe that the tendency—the tendency of public opinion at the present time—is toward the latter, to let the community reap the benefits in that in the creation of which they have been so large a factor. I think in any legislation at this time we should face forward and not backward. So that it means simply that we will give an opportunity for the citizens of 50 years hence to decide whether they will take over the plant at what I believe will be a fair value, if they pay simply the actual cost on the lands, and it will be not only equitable but it will not be prohibitive, as I suggested a while ago it might be if it was put on the basis of what its fair value was at that particular time.

So, Mr. President, the heads of the departments that have been charged with the duty of investigating and considering this precise question have expressed themselves upon this important question in no uncertain and no doubtful or ambiguous terms.

Now I want to say a word with reference to the amendment offered by me. It was suggested in this behalf that some of the amendments—and in that statement my own amendment might be included—were phrased in language that made the burden heavier than that prescribed in the bill which has come from the Public Lands Committee. A careful study of the amendment offered by myself in connection with the bill under consideration and the bill reported from the Public Lands Committee will show that the two are substantially the same. But I want to speak at this time particularly with reference to that provision of the amendment offered by me which deals with the subject of water rights; and I especially address myself to the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who does me the honor to listen to my poor remarks, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who, I see, is absent from the Chamber at this time.

I should consider it as a most indefensible wrong to the people of the States in which these great powers are to be developed if those who come after us 50 years hence were called upon to pay the value that water rights shall have at that time before they can take over these properties.

Why, Mr. President, a man may now acquire a water right in a stream the water of which has not yet been appropriated, or not fully appropriated, without the expense of a dollar to himself except some trifling amount for the drafting and filing of a notice. One desiring to take out a water right, to acquire the right to divert the waters of a stream from their bed, may file a notice that he intends to take out the water. The notice designates the place at which he is going to divert it and the purpose to which it is going to be applied. He is then required to follow that up with his work, and eventually to divert the water. He thus acquires what is known as a water right. That gives him the exclusive right to divert that water from the stream. If he has not diverted it all, anyone else may come and file a subsequent notice and acquire the right to divert what is left, or so much of what is left as he may care to use. So that any person, having secured, under the provisions of this act, a permit from the General Government authorizing him to put a dam in a navigable stream, must, in order to insure himself whatever value there is in that, acquire a water right—namely, the right to take the water out of a stream. If he does not do so, anyone else may go in and file his application and may divert all of the water of the stream above him, and he has a dam in a dry stream, with no possibility of the development of power at all.

He will, then, take the precaution, at the same time that he gets his permit from the General Government, or immediately before, or immediately after, to take out a water right. Then if anyone else endeavors to divert the water of that stream above him and take it away from his channel, he may go into court and secure an injunction against that person, commanding him to desist from diverting the water from the stream and to allow it to flow down its channel until it reaches his dam.

He does that, and, as I say, it does not cost him one red cent except a mere matter of a few dollars for drawing the location notice and for filing it. And now 50 years go by, Mr. President, and he owns the water right. Now, the right to dam the navigable stream passes to some one else, but because he owns the water right he may go and put a dam in the stream above that dam and divert all of the water of the stream and leave the dam, as I said a while ago, across a dry stream. Therefore, Mr. President, the man who comes after him, who gets the right to put in the dam where he had it and to operate the dam where he had it, is obliged to acquire from him this right to divert the water. Those rights are increasing in value by leaps and bounds all over the western country, and 50 years from now no man can venture to say what enormous value they may have.

Why, Mr. President, you know about the Reclamation Service. We sell the land at a trifle; we give it away to homesteaders, but the great value comes in in the right to take water out of an adjacent stream and put it on the land. It is the water right that is the valuable thing in that country where land is abundant and water is rare. Thus, Mr. President, you say that 50 years hence the people who exercise this privilege which you accord to them, and which can be exercised only by the acquisition of the water right do not lose that water right unless you pay them the whole value that it has at that time.

That is utterly indefensible. You can not justify it upon any theory. I am sure that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who has taken a keen interest in this bill, will appreciate the force of what I say, and the necessity, if you are going to make this right of any value at all, to make some provisions other than is provided in this bill to turn over the water rights.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to me, I will say that water rights, as they are called in the State of Colorado, are not regarded as of any value, because they can be regulated and can be controlled by some kind of a commission. The company that takes out a water right by means of a ditch is considered a public carrier. The statutes of the State of Colorado require that it shall submit to the county commissioners of the county the price that it charges; and the result is that if it charges too high a price the commissioners reduce the amount that can be charged. Consequently great companies that were started there absolutely failed, because the county commissioners put the price per inch, as they put it, or the price per cubic foot per second, at too low a figure.

That was true of the great ditch that was constructed by English capital near Denver. They laid out a very large, broad ditch, and the proposition came up as to whether they could charge a royalty. They attempted in the first instance to put a royalty of a certain amount—$20 an acre—on those who wanted to use it, and then the running charges, or the amount that was required to run the ditch. The result was that the company itself was defeated of that right, the supreme court holding that these waters were for the use of the public; that the persons who used them ultimately were the persons to be benefited and not the common carrier; and that the common carrier could charge nothing more than a reasonable price for running the water, based upon the amount of money which it had invested in the enterprise. The result was that that great Northern Colorado Co. went into bankruptcy and absolutely failed, because the county commissioners, in deciding this matter, put the amount per acre at a price so low that it would return the company no income upon its investment, but practically an amount equal only to the running charges of the ditch.

Mr. President, what was that water right worth? It was not worth anything; and if you have a regulating commission in the State, where this bill provides that it shall be, it takes out all of the fictitious value in what are termed "water rights," because the right exists only for the diversion of the water for the use and benefit of those that use it; and with a public-utility commission such as we have in the State of Colorado, or such as exists in most of the States, they can regulate it and say: "You are not entitled to anything except a reasonable return upon your investment, and therefore the fiction of putting in a large amount for something that does not really belong to you does not prevail."

Mr. President, that is the conception and that is the reason why, in this bill, I have thought it was best not to hamper the company by restrictions; because it has all got to come out of the consumer, and if you have a regulating commission that will say to them that they can not and they shall not charge more than a certain amount that is where the public are going to get the most benefit. On that account it seems to me that all of these hampering provisions, all of these difficulties, all of these restrictions, will not give the consumer anything like the amount he would get if it was in the control of the State where the people are interested, watching these things, knowing just what prices are excessive and what are not; and the result will be, in my judgment, that the more restrictions you put upon this the less interest in the consumer will arise. Then we must add to that the fact that, as the Senator has said, these companies are required to put large sums of money into something that the Government wants, and they have to get that money back in some way. When they are required to furnish electricity for the purpose of opening the gates, that is a condition that costs something. When one of these companies begins to look at an enterprise, the question arises in their minds, and they say: "Oh, these burdens are too much; we can not take it;" and they leave it just as the other two acts—the act of 1906 and the act of 1910—left it. Both of them required too much, and we have not had any enterprise developed by reason of them.

To remove that and simply to say that we can take that land and put other burdens upon it is just simply equivalent to saying that we will keep these lands, let no development take place, and let this water which is going to waste now not be utilized.

The Senator and I have the same object in view. I have not any doubt that he is earnest and honest in regard to it, and I hope that the same opinion prevails as to my view. The Senator's view is that by charging something in the first instance, or by putting in restrictions that seemingly are in the interest of the people, you will thereby make a great saving. My belief is that the best instrument you have for the purpose of preventing the individual from being robbed is the public-utility commission that says that only a fair rate shall be charged; and, as I showed here the other day, the Colorado commission saved $1,000,000 during the last year over the rates that existed, and have brought about a great saving to the people. What would that have been if it had been expressed in the way of paying for a franchise? Why, probably $50,000, or maybe $100,000. Thus you will find that the public-utility commission is saving for the people enormous sums of money. The question is whether the company will be induced to go in and undertake this enterprise. If you have placed too many restrictions upon it, it will not do so. If, however, you leave it to the commission, and let the utility commission determine these matters, then it seems to me that it will be best for the individual and best for the people in these States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we get nowhere at all in these discussions. Of course I did not invite from the Senator from Colorado—although I am always glad to listen to him—any general discussion of the principles of this bill, or the wisdom of it. I was endeavoring to direct his attention solely to the question whether, when the property is taken over at the end of the 50 years, we ought to pay the value of the water rights, be they little or big—my own idea is that they will be big—or whether we ought to pay no more than the cost of the water rights. The Senator has not answered that question, however. The Senator is talking about irrigation companies, of course. One organizes an irrigation company for the purpose of getting out water and selling water to consumers. That is open to regulation in his State, as it is in mine. That is entirely aside from this question. This is not an irrigation company.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am asking the question purely for information: In those States to which the Senator has referred, is the running of water through a water wheel for the development of power considered an appropriation of water?

Mr. WALSH. It is.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that the right must be secured from the State? I mean in those cases in which there is no diminution of the flow, but a mere passage of the water through a water wheel.

Mr. WALSH. It must.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the water is desired for that purpose the authority of the State must be invoked as well as when it is diverted from the stream and used for irrigation?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir. You must comply with the law of the State in relation to the appropriation of water whenever you desire to devote the water to any useful purpose, and under the laws of the State you are entitled to divert it for any useful purpose.

The Senator from Iowa will recognize that even in the case of a gristmill you divert the water from the stream, to some extent, into an adjacent flume or race, and from that it goes on to the wheel. The construction of a power plant of any character right in the stream itself is a rarity. Some diversion must be exercised. If one desires to divert water which is to be applied immediately to a wheel, to develop power which is to be applied immediately to machinery, without converting it into electrical energy, he must comply with the law of the State in relation to the appropriation of the water of a stream. If he does not do so, some one else may go above him upon the stream, throw a dam across the stream, and divert every drop of water out of the stream, so that he will have nothing with which to operate his mill wheel. But, having complied with the law, he may then go into court and compel the upper diverter to allow all the water that is necessary for his purposes to come down the stream.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assume that in the case of a navigable river no one would be permitted to divert all the water from the stream and thus entirely destroy its flow.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is right about that. That is to say, the Government, in the interest of navigation, could insist upon the water coming down, even though a man had made the appropriation. But the Senator will likewise recognize that there is not much navigation on many of these streams that fall within the purpose of the act, and accordingly it does not by any means follow that the upper dam might not be utilized to divert all of the water from the stream if the lower dam, the one constructed under the Government permit, had not acquired the water right. Then, further, one might go above on a stream where it was not navigable and construct a dam which would lessen the flow below, and thus reduce the power that might be developed, and possibly reduce the navigability of the river.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. In some States does not the law of prior appropriation apply so that no formal application to the State authorities is required, but the prior appropriator of the water has the right as against anyone who would go above him on the stream and divert the water?

Mr. WALSH. What is it that the Senator would like to know?

Mr. STERLING. If the law of prior appropriation of the water does not govern in some States?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; and in others, of course, it is not recognized at all. But the provision which I desire to see incorporated in the bill is that when the man who gets this grant from the Government acquires the water rights which are essential to the use of that privilege, and the Government takes over the property at the end of the 50 years, the Government shall pay him nothing if he paid nothing for the water rights, and if it cost him something because some one else had already made the appropriation and he was required to get it, the Government shall then pay him exactly what he was obliged to pay for the water, and no more.

Mr. President, do not for one single moment think that because this bill is applicable to a very much greater area of country in which the doctrine of prior appropriation does not exist at all that it is not an important matter, or even that it is a matter of minor importance, because the fact about the matter is, as I said a while ago, that at least two-thirds of all the power that can be produced in this country under the protection of this act will be generated in those States in which the doctrine of prior appropriation applies. I sent to the head of the Geological Survey the other day for the purpose of getting a list of those sites upon the streams of the country within the navigable waters—that is to say, waters that are actually or immediately potentially navigable—and he gave me the list, which it might be well to have in view when we are canvassing this bill:

The Celilo Falls, on the Columbia River, Oreg. and Wash., generally known as The Dalles; proposed installation, 1,080,000 horsepower; estimated cost, $50,000,000. You will understand that great boats navigate that river—as large, perhaps, as ply upon any rivers in this country—and they go right through The Dalles. The Government has expended a large amount of money in the improvement of navigation there, so that actual navigation is carried on now for 200 miles above Celilo Falls.

Priest Rapids, on the Columbia River, Wash.; proposed installation, about 400,000 horsepower.

Z Canyon, on Clarks Fork, Wash.; proposed installation, 200,000 horsepower; estimated cost, $8,000,000.

Windsor Locks, on Connecticut River, Conn.; estimated cost, $5,500,000. The estimated horsepower is 30,000. It is insignificant, compared with the enormous amount of power that can be developed upon the Columbia.

Series of plants on Coosa River, Ala.; proposed installation, 222,000 horsepower; estimated cost, $24,000,000.

Then we have a later one:

In addition to developments previously mentioned in Columbia River Basin, there are several rapids on Columbia River where large power development may ultimately be made. There are numerous stretches on Snake River where large units of power can probably be developed at reasonable cost. At Kootenai Falls, Mont., on Kootenai River, it is estimated that an installation of 80,000 horsepower at an estimated cost of $6,000,000 can probably be made. This river is navigable both above and below the falls.

At the Muscle Shoals, on Tennessee River, in Alabama, it is estimated that an installation of 120,000 horsepower is justified. The cost of this development, including navigation phases, is variously estimated from about $20,000,000 to more than $30,000,000.

So, Mr. President, this is a matter of tremendous importance. I should like to find some one upon the floor of the Senate who can stand up and justify the contention that 50 years hence, when the Government takes this property over, it should pay the then value of these water rights as distinguished from the cost at which they were acquired. I want to give the company every dollar they put into the property and not take a penny away from them.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] may have some views on this subject. I would be very glad if he would express to us his idea about it at either this or some other time.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that you can not estimate the value of this property at the end of 50 years without giving value to the franchise that you are now extending by virtue of the bill. What makes the value of these water rights at the end of 50 years? It is the possibility that through that water right you can develop power at this place and sell it at a great profit, or that you can divert the water and take it to some other place where by its fall you can develop power that will be immensely valuable, or that you can, by a proper expenditure, carry the water away and put it upon land which you can irrigate by means of water thus diverted through the water right which you acquire.

In other words, you will observe, Mr. President, that in determining the value of these water rights at the end of the 50-year period the right to develop power at the point where the navigable stream is dammed is an indissoluble element in that estimate of value. In other words, although the bill provides that nothing shall be allowed for the privilege hereby granted, you can not possibly prevent it if you allow the grantee the then value of the water rights. Is not exactly the same situation presented to us in connection with the plant itself?

Mr. President, here is a dam site. The land upon each side of the navigable river upon which the dam rests in all reasonable possibility is rocky land, unproductive. It could not be used for agricultural purposes. It is doubtless more or less remote from a city, and could not be used in all probability for city lots. The probabilities are that there is no great mineral value in it. In fact, Mr. President, the only value it has is because it commands the place where you can develop power. You can not possibly disassociate it from that property, from the question of the value of the power that can be developed at it. In other words, you can not disassociate from the value of the power site the privilege and franchise granted by virtue of the provisions of the bill, and therefore you ought not to give the value with one hand and take it away with the other. As to lands which are remote from that I agree that there is no good reason why the fair value should not be paid; but those properties which are directly associated with the development of the power I insist should be turned over at the actual cost of them.

Now, let me make another suggestion in this connection. We speak about the acquisition of water rights. Mr. President, there is another great and valuable privilege that is accorded by the law that does not cost the grantee of the privilege a dollar, and that is the right to have a right of way across the public lands. He comes here to the Secretary of the Interior and makes an application for the right to construct a transmission line across the public domain. He obtains that right. Here is a man who has a transmission line running across the public domain for a distance of 100, 200, or 300 miles. He has obtained that right. It cost him nothing; it was a free gift from the Government. But in the meantime all the land in the country has been taken up and appropriated.

Mr. President, 50 years is an awfully long time. We are disposing of public lands in the State of Montana to-day at the rate of 6,000,000 acres a year, and it will be a matter of only 10 years at that rate until all the public lands in our State will have passed into private ownership. We hear a lot once in a while about what an oppression it is to these States. There may be a complaint in some States. I dare say there is in the State of Nevada and in the State of Colorado. We have not any complaint in Montana. The lands are going awfully fast, I am told. But here is a right obtained from the Government of the United States to run a transmission line across the public domain for a distance of 200 miles, and that 50 years hence has become an immensely valuable right, a right of no little consequence at all. In other words, if you were obliged to go out elsewhere and purchase the right to run the wires over other lands held in private ownership, the amount which you would be obliged to pay would be very considerable indeed. That is the basis upon which that right of way must be estimated; that is to say, the grantee would be entitled to as much for his right of way as the Government would be obliged to pay if it went out and bought a parallel right of way, and the grantees got this for nothing. They got it for the mere asking. They got it because we gave it to them, and we gave it to them freely, because we are desirous of having this development go on.

But, Mr. President, upon what basis can we justify ourselves before the people of the United States if after turning over these valuable privileges to these people without a dollar of cost, 50 years hence, when we desire to have them back, we estimate them at what it will cost to get a like right of way somewhere else, upon the fair value as it will be at that time? These features of the matter I hope may have the sympathetic attention of the Senator from Tennessee, even though he disagrees with me about some of the other matters which have been submitted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] regarding the Great Falls power project, involving an expenditure of about $15,000,000 in all, and $10,000,000 for that part of the plant which relates to the development of power and light as distinguished from the water supply of Washington, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Hennen Jennings regarding the various electric-light and power plants which are now being gradually erected by the National Government and which are being operated by coal. It shows that in connection with and including the proposed central power plant near the Mall there will be a total expenditure of about $5,000,000 in the development of plants to be operated by coal.

It seems to me that is a very strong argument in favor of the immediate consideration of the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, and that instead of expending these large sums of money upon detached plants for the development of power and heat and light by coal-operated plants we should proceed immediately to the larger project involved in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska.

I ask consent that, without reading, the letter to which I refer be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 29, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
Committee on the Library, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NEWLANDS: Referring to the hearings now going on before the Committee on the Library, United States Senate, regarding joint resolution No. 92, introduced by you, providing for the suspension of the construction of a power plant on the water front facing the Potomac Park system and designated in the hearings as "Central heating, lighting, and power plant on the Mall," I beg to say that since my letter to your committee of the 13th of January I have continued my study of the problem of this plant strictly on economic lines, which, with the large amount of additional information gathered, has led me to the following conclusions:

The name "Central heating, lighting, and power plant" is misleading and a misnomer if confined to the present plans and appropriations for the Mall power station, because of the fact that the various departments of the Federal and District Governments consume over 200,000 tons of coal a year, while the consumption of the group of 14 buildings to be served by the new power station is only 39,000 tons, or 19 per cent of the total consumption.

No adequate reason seems advanced why the Capitol and navy yard plants could not be economically and advantageously extended so as to perform the functions of a real central power station, and thus do away with a further mere departmental effort.

In the construction of the Capitol and navy yard plants the Government has already expended $2,300,000, and certainly some of this expenditure should have value in case a central distribution of electric and heating power be decided upon at either one or both of these points.

The modern gospel of efficiency demands the maximum distribution of power from the fewest possible points. Obviously labor costs are decreased as the number of plants is reduced, and the highest grade machinery is justifiable largely in proportion to the magnitude of the plant. When the Mall plant is completed and in operation there will still be 21 large Government users of coal not coupled up to it, and these burn 131,000 tons of coal annually.

From calculations made possible by the tabular statement appended the mean distance of total coal consumption for both steam and electric power estimated for the 35 Government plants and buildings, using 170,000 tons of coal a year, is found for three sites to be as follows: Capitol, 8,250 feet; Mall, 9,100 feet; navy yard, 9,550 feet—a most remarkably close showing and a demonstration of the feasibility and the advantages of power distribution from a central plant at any one of these sites.

The map attached, on which are drawn three concentric circles 5,000 feet apart, with distinctive symbols from each station, graphically shows the service obtainable for any distance from any one of these points, as also the farthest points that might be served, such as Almshouse, Soldiers' Home, Bureau of Standards, etc., but none of which is more than 6 miles distant. Contrast this position with Bennings, where is situated the large power plant of the Potomac Electric Power Co.

The navy-yard power plant is ideally situated for a great electrical power station. It has all the advantages of rail and water communication claimed for the Mall plant, and in addition needs no great architectural expenditure to put it in harmony with its environment, which comprises workshops, locomotives, etc.

The Capitol site is seen by calculations and from the map to be the most favored as a great central steam-distributing center. The Capitol and navy-yard stations, in connection with expenditures already made and coupled together with both steam and electricity, could act as emergency stations for each other in time of fire, war, or other stress, and be made to do economical teamwork. Such a plan justifies the closest and most careful investigation.

Up to the present time the contractor of the Mall plant has not probably expended, in excavation and preliminary equipment on the site, more than $2,000 or $3,000. No doubt his services and the equipment under order could, with some modifications, be utilized should an impartial commission decide on economical grounds that the Mall site was not the most advantageous.

These facts speak for themselves and show the reasonableness of a suspension of work on the new power plant pending thorough economic investigation. With these facts before me I feel warranted in claiming your careful attention as to the manner in which they have been gathered and the conclusions that should be drawn.

During my study of this very important matter I have been impressed with the fact that there seems to be no central office or bureau of the Government that has complete information regarding all fuel requirements, equipment, and operation of the power plants in the District of Columbia. In other words, the Government has no clearing house for such information.

It would appear that the Treasury Department from diffidence, oversight, overconfidence, or some other cause, not only failed to avail itself of the expert services of the Fine Arts Commission but also it has not sought the expert services of other branches of the Federal service who have experts in particular lines of investigations dealing with some of the different phases of the problems at hand. I am also informed that the chief engineer of the Treasury Department did not visit all the present power plants in operation to take stock of their position, capacities, and potential possibilities.

As a case in point, the Bureau of Mines is that branch of the Federal service specifically authorized by Congress to make investigations regarding the most efficient use of fuels, the following being quoted from the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the Government for the year ended June 30, 1916:

"An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

"BUREAU OF MINES.

"For investigation of mineral fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to or for the use of the United States, with a view to their most efficient mining, preparation, treatment, and use, and to recommend to various departments such changes in selection and use of fuel as may result in greater economy * * * $135,000."

The duties and functions of the bureau, as imposed by act of Congress, are set forth in the Fifth Annual Report by the Director of the Bureau of Mines to the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, a copy of which is appended. A careful perusal of pages 64 to 73 of the report will show the scope and character of the work the bureau is doing to increase efficiency in the utilization of fuel.

The chief metallurgist of the bureau is F. G. Cottrell, who has gained wide fame through his investigations of smelter smoke. By gift of the rights of his electrical precipitation process for 40 States of the Union he founded the altruistic research corporation. I herewith inclose a pamphlet written by Mr. Cottrell, entitled "Problems in smoke, fume, and dust abatement."

FUEL ESTIMATES.

The estimates for coal consumption for the Federal and District Governments for the fiscal year 1914–15 are approximately as follows:

	Bituminous.	Anthracite.
	Tons.	Tons.
General Supply Committee	72,000	29,000
District Government	29,000	9,400
Contracts not under the Government Supply Committee or District government:
Navy Department	27,500	3,000
Capitol power plant	25,000	.....
Filtration plant	4,000	.....
War College	.....	2,450
Miscellaneous	390	440
Grand total	202,180

This estimate is subject to correction, but there seems to be little doubt that the total consumption is over 200,000 tons and is distributed at some 110 plants, without counting the schools and fire departments.

According to the testimony of Mr. Wetmore before the Library Committee, the buildings that are to be served at first by the proposed Mall plant are as folows:

Agriculture; Army Medical Museum; Bureau of Engraving and Printing; Court of Claims; District Building; Fisheries; Mills Building; Post Office Building, Eleventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue; Smithsonian group; State, War, and Navy Building; Treasury Building; Washington Monument; White House; Winder Building.

The appropriation of $1,459,104 for the Mall plant requires that the plant shall be of sufficient capacity to provide for the contemplated buildings for the Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments and for cross service with the Capitol power plant.

The proposed additional buildings to be served by the Mall plant, for which a further appropriation of $175,000 is asked, are, viz:

Johnson-Walker (rented by the Navy Department), Lincoln Memorial, Interior Department Building (new), the Memorial Building of the Women (Red Cross).

The table appended gives the relative distances of all the buildings from three centers, viz, the Capitol, the Mall, and the navy-yard power plants. It also gives the estimated tonnage and prices per ton for all the 35 selected main coal-consuming plants and buildings, which are divided into two groups—14 in the new Mall system, using about 39,000 tons, costing $141,000, and 21 in other important points, using 131,000 tons, costing $431,000; a total of 170,000 tons, costing $572,000.

The mean distance of the total coal consumption from each of the three plants—Capitol, Mall, and Navy Yard—is found as follows: For each plant the distance from that plant to each building is multiplied by the tonnage of coal consumed by that building and the sum of the products is divided by the total tonnage of 170,000. This mean distance for each is as follows: Capitol, 8,250 feet; Mall, 9,100 feet; Navy Yard, 9,550 feet.

The cost of coal per ton at the different plants varies because of the different varieties of coal used and because of different distances of wagon haulage. The latter adds from 25 to 50 cents per ton to its rail cost. The average prices are: For bituminous, $3.16, and anthracite, $5.27. The average for anthracite includes the steam sizes as well as those for domestic use. The price per ton of $2.88, paid at the Capitol station, is the lowest on the list.

Considering the 35 points of large consumption, the Mall plant provides for the centralization and replacement of only 23 per cent of this coal consumption.

The Potomac Electric Power Co. supplies power to these 35 different places in various quantities and at various rates. No data are before me as regards the total cost of the Federal and District Government requirements, but certainly should street and park lighting and other District needs be included, it would amount to between $200,000 and $300,000. I have made a more successful effort, however, to obtain the electric purchases for group 1, which probably do not amount to much more than $35,000 per annum, and of which $12,000 is used at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and hence the Mall plant would do away with but a comparatively small amount of the power purchased by the Federal and District Governments from the Potomac Electric Power Co.

On the appended map the main Government buildings in the District of Columbia are given and, in addition, all points mentioned in connection with the tabular statement.

From the three power-plant sites as centers, the distances of all these buildings from anyone of these points can be graphically grasped by the progressive circles of 5,000, 10,000, and 15,000 feet, which are drawn in different symbols.

Note the position of the Mall site, which is at the end of the narrow Washington Channel, whereas the navy yard is on the more important Anacostia River. It will be noted that the Capitol plant is only 3,700 feet from the Anacostia River, where an electric pumping station furnishes water for the power-plant use.

Compare the Potomac Electric Power Co.'s plant with anyone of the three points under discussion and note how much more favored anyone of these is in regard to center of gravity of the Government power load.

ELECTRICAL DISTRIBUTION.

The factor of distance in the electrical distribution of power with alternating currents and high voltages is such that the variation in the mean distances, as shown from the tabulated statement, presents no need for discussion, and thus it can be assumed that, on the basis of distance, anyone of the sites is as favorable for great electric-power distribution plant as the other.

STEAM DISTRIBUTION.

The economic distances to which steam can with reasonable economy be extended have, in the minds of distinguished and competent engineers, been of late greatly lengthened by better insulation and the use of higher steam pressures; 15,000 feet is not now considered uneconomical.

Note the statements of Messrs. Stillwell, Bolton, and Wilzus, and others before your committee and the Committee on Appropriations. The New York Steam Co.'s late work and their willingness to contract to distribute steam with high economy to distances exceeding even 15,000 feet is another assurance.

The table shows that for the mean distance of coal consumption the Capitol plant is the most favored. Calculation also further emphasizes this in that the consumption that could be taken care of by electric and steam distribution from the three centers, with a straight-line radius of 11,500 feet, is as follows:

	Tons.
Capitol, 25 points	141,000
Mall, 26 points	123,000
Navy yard, 16 points	130,000

Both the table and the map indicate that the "14 existing buildings to be served by the Mall plant" are all within a a radius of 11,500 feet from the Capitol power site, which, with 25 per cent allowance for the deflections of the mains, would permit economic steam distribution within 15,000 feet.

It should also be noted how the load would be lightened as distances are increased eastward along the Mall region, the distance to the Smithsonian group being only 5,900 feet, to the Land Office group 6,500, to the Agricultural group 7,000, and to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing 7,500 feet.

It has been a most difficult matter to obtain any accurate information regarding the relative proportion of steam and electric power used in the Government buildings, for consumption varies at different seasons of the year and at different times of the day, and facilities for accurate records are not installed at all buildings. However, as an approximation, the proportions may be estimated as 60 per cent for steam power and 40 per cent for electric.

BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF PLANTS VISITED.

CAPITOL PLANT.

This plant is situated about 2,500 feet southwest from the Capitol, near the small Garfield Park, in a rather unpretentious neighborhood and in close proximity to a railroad, by which it has excellent facilities of obtaining its fuel direct and of disposing of its ashes in the same way. It is provided with a piping system by which it can use the water of the Potomac for condensing purposes.

It is considerably below the Capitol Plaza, from which none of the power house is visible except a small upper section of the two stacks, which are 11 feet in diameter and 212 feet high. There are here installed 16 boilers of 520 horsepower each, or a total of 8,000 horsepower. There are four 2,000-kilowatt generators, driven by turbine engines.

The plant was started in 1904, the first estimate being only $750,000, but up to date, on account of extensions to Senate and House Office Buildings and other causes, an expenditure of $1,400,000 has been made. The service from this plant requires about 25,000 tons of coal a year, so the plant has a great reserve of electric and boiler-house power, as its coal consumption shows.

There would appear no adequate reason why this plant could not be greatly enlarged, and with proper boilers, stokers, and auxiliary force draft would prevent any nuisance from smoke or gas at this point in excess of that now experienced, and quite probably the emission of smoke would be less.

NAVY-YARD PLANT.

The navy-yard power plant is close to the navy-yard shops and very close to the Anacostia River, where necessary water supply and shipping facilities are most favorable. The plant has railroad connection by which all of the coal used has been obtained.

High smokestacks and buildings constructed for economic considerations alone are in entire conformity with this environment, and there is no reasonable limitation to the extent to which the present power plant could be favorably extended. At present there is installed an excellent 6,000-horsepower boiler plant, supplying compound engines that drive 2,500-kilowatt generators. The housing already erected would permit very extensive additions to the electric plant at little cost.

The total cost of this plant in connection with its steam and electrical distribution is, I am told, about $900,000. In fact, taking all in all, this site is ideally situated for a great electric-power station, and if desired could be made to take care of all Government and District needs in the way of electric power. At present electric current is being generated at the navy-yard plant at a cost of about 1 cent per kilowatt. With larger and more modern equipment this cost could be decidedly reduced.

SEWAGE-PUMPING STATION.

Here, in an imposing building, within 1,500 feet of the navy-yard plant, an independent boiler plant, triple-expansion steam engines, and high-grade pumps are installed for handling the sewage of the District. The station is under the supervision of the District government. There are 27 men employed at it.

Although by casual observance the pumping-station plant seems excellent, the existence of this plant so close to the navy-yard plant seems an anomaly. Such anomalies would be avoided if all Government departments did engineering teamwork.

DISTRICT PUMPING STATION.

On the map this pumping plant is No. 65, and is only 1,000 feet north of the new reservoir pumping station, which is under control of the War Department. It is seen also that these stations are in close proximity to Soldiers' Home.

The District pumping station is most imposingly housed and would appear to have most excellent boiler and steam pumping plant, which is, no doubt, capable of dealing with the present requirements of the city. The coal consumption is 6,000 tons yearly of bituminous coal, costing $3.25 per ton. The lack of railroad facilities, no doubt, is the cause of the coal costing more than at the Capitol power plant.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE PLANT.

This is situated 6,050 feet from the Capitol power station and near the new post office and the Union Station. The plant is an old one and the machinery not of the highest modern type. The new post office is heated from this station.

There are installed five boilers with 2,500 aggregate horsepower. Three of these are of the marine type, fired by hand. The condensing water for the engines is obtained from the water mains after filtering. In this way some 2,000,000 gallons a day are made use of, half of which is again used in the building for other purposes than for condensing, but the balance is sent to waste in the sewer mains. Should the water department's charges for the water supplied be the same as those charged the public, the charge for the water thus wasted would be equivalent to $100 a day.

LAND OFFICE PLANT.

This plant is house in the basement of the Land Office Building, and supplies the Patent Office, Bureau of Mines, Reclamation Service, Pension Office, and District courts, in addition to the Land Office Building, with both electric and steam power.

It has one independent smokestack, 7 feet in diameter, which is only 140 feet above the courtyard level, and thus not much higher than some of the office buildings in the vicinity.

The boiler and engine forces amount to 17 men, and from the table it is seen that the annual coal consumption is estimated at 7,000 tons, which, at $3.43 per ton, equals $24,000.

There is an installation of six boilers, with 1,410-horsepower capacity, and one large electric steam generator with cross-compound steam engine and four smaller ones, the combined rating of which is 625 kilowatts. The engines are worked noncondensing, and the boiler water is obtained from the mains. The plant is handicapped in many respects, but seems to be well run and attended to.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING PLANT.

The bureau plant is housed in an unpretentious way in connection with the old building of the bureau. I have been unable to find out its first cost, but there has certainly been no outlay for architectural effect.

The installation consists of two excellent tandem-compound engines and two smaller ones, the total electrical power capacity being about 1,300 horsepower. There are two 500-horsepower Keely boilers and three 250-horsepower Babcock-Wilcox, making the steam installation 1,750 horsepower. The engines are worked condensing, the water for the condensers being obtained from the city mains. It is claimed little of the circulating water is returned to the sewer, a large amount of it being used in the laundries and for heating by means of the condensers. The power from this plant is supplemented by the purchase of some $12,000 worth of electric current from the Potomac Electric Power Co. at the rate of 3.8 cents per kilowatt. Considering the size of the plants, the present showing they give of cost per kilowatt is most excellent for 1913 and 1914, being under 1 cent. For the last year the cost was 1.3 cents.

ANALYSIS OF SOME OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT'S STATEMENTS.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of February 7, states:

"The central plant will effect an annual saving to the Government, considering existing buildings only as named in the act, of $177,000."

The outlay incident thereto has been contracted for at $1,463,575.

The table indicates that the Mall plant group uses only 39,000 tons of coal, costing $141,000. The amount of power purchased from the Potomac Electric Power Co. for these buildings is about $35,000, making a total of $175,000, or $2,000 less than the saving claimed.

It is estimated that the new plant will consume only 30,000 tons of coal, a saving of only 9,000 tons.

It is stated by Mr. Thompson that interest and sinking-fund charges should be included in estimates to show relative efficiencies. If this be the case, there should be added to the operating and general expenses some $50,000 or $60,000.

I am awaiting with much interest the explanation of the Treasury Department's officials how, with the above conditions, this saving is to be effected.

The Secretary further states in his letter:

"The plant will eliminate from the city of Washington 17 smokestacks now existing on Federal buildings, which discharge smoke and gases from their individual plants."

The proposed new power plant will serve but 14 buildings when it begins to operate, and of these coal users it would appear that not over one-third or one-quarter have outside stacks.

The Secretary of the Treasury also states in his letter:

"The plant is fairly within the center of gravity of the load. It is within 800 feet of the buildings that will take 50 per cent of all the steam generated and nearly 40 per cent of all the electricity generated. The greater portion of the buildings to be served are relatively the small consumers."

This must refer to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The table shows that the coal consumption of that plant is only 13,000 tons a year, with a $12,000 purchase of electric current.

The Capitol group uses 25,000 tons, the navy yard 25,000 tons, and the Government Printing Office 15,000 tons, making a total of 65,000.

From these facts it is obvious that the new power plant is not in the center of gravity of a real central plant, but is merely in a departmental zone, dealing with about 23 per cent of the coal consumption shown in the tabulated statement.

Even admitting the centralization of the plant as a departmental plant, is it good engineering, with 50 per cent of the power being used at one point, to erect a central new plant 800 feet from it?

SUGGESTIONS.

I wish it clearly understood that in presenting the tabular grouping it is not my recommendation that all buildings and power plants shown therein be immediately yoked together. Such advice could only be justified and prove of value after far greater study and more exhaustive estimates, and no doubt, although finally all the buildings may be served electrically from one center, for steam heating several centers may be desirable.

Attempt is made merely to give a general bird's-eye view of the whole problem showing the fruitful field for investigation and the chances of great savings in first and in operating costs.

Without in any way desiring to prescribe the limits and studies of some future commission that will probably be asked to report on this whole question, it may be useful to point out at least one plan of action that will be far more comprehensive and economical than the erection of the Mall plant.

Let the boiler and electrical equipment of the navy-yard plant be extended unit by unit as required, so that it will finally supply all the present and future demands for electricity for the Government buildings. The facilities in connection with this power site have already been described.

Make both electrical and steam connection with the navy yard and Capitol power plants. Let the Capitol power plant be considered essentially as a steam-heat distributor. It can, however, at first help electrically, and this installation will always have value to the navy-yard plant as an electrical reserve in time of stress or accident.

As the steam load at the Capitol plant becomes excessive, the present steam heat now supplied from the Capitol site could be taken care of by steam from the navy yard, and the Capitol plant could be made to deal with more distant points in the Mall region to the west and north. In this way these two plants on which the Government has expended $2,300,000 could be usefully and completely extended, do splendid teamwork, and eliminate an unnecessary and inconclusive power scheme.

CONCLUSIONS.

My conclusions have already, in a great measure, been given as a foreword in this letter, but what I desire most to emphasize is the great initial economic possibilities connected with a great comprehensive scheme of Government power distribution that will not only provide departments peacemeal but for the wants of the whole and for long periods.

I can not do better in emphasizing this point, as also other statements that I have made, than to quote first from the statement of Mr. Lewis B. Stillwell, who is a past president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, and was called in by the Treasury Department as a consulting engineer for the proposed new power plant. He states in the hearings before the Library Committee, February 3:

"Mr. STILLWELL. That clears the situation, so far as I am concerned, very satisfactorily.

"I should like to say at the outset that my firm has, in this matter, assumed no responsibility in regard to the selection of a site. We have been told that that matter was settled before we were called in; that the plant was to be located at a certain point. Our function has been limited to this: That my firm has supplied a number of expert mechanical and electrical designers who have been placed temporarily on the rolls of the Supervising Architect's Office to make the plans for the mechanical and electrical equipment and for the power house in so far as its structure is directly related to that equipment. For the architectural merits or demerits of that power house we assume no responsibility. That has been in the hands of the Supervising Architect and his representatives.

"As to the site, expressing my personal opinion of the matter—and I am glad to have an opportunity to do so—I think this whole matter has been approached here in a way that could not be expected to attain the best economical results. For instance, one of the first things that suggested itself to us when we came here was why build a new plant? Why not extend the existing plant? Of course, the present plant is farther away from the buildings which are to be heated, and it is possible that, were we to figure out the losses in transmitting the steam, we might reach the conclusion that it was unwise to transmit it so far. That problem, so far as I know, has never been investigated. It certainly has not been by my associates or myself.

"Another question that I asked soon after I came here was this: How is this plant correlated with the possible utilization of the Great Falls of the Potomac, in regard to which Mr. Clemens Herschell made a report for the War Department a year or two ago? And my impression is that up to this time there has been no attempt to consider broadly whether the Great Falls of the Potomac in cooperation with the steam plant here, or otherwise, could be utilized to advantage in the city of Washington. I make this statement because I want to say that, as an engineer, I think this problem should be studied on broad lines—on lines as broad as those which have been applied by the Arts Commission in its work—and that the whole problem of the supply of electricity for lighting and power purposes and of heating from central stations—if that be the best way—should be laid out now on a plan which can be substantially adhered to for the next 50 or 100 years. The development ought to be systematic and symmetrical in respect of power supply as in respect of architectural development.

"Now, as to the plant that has been contracted for, the department has found it necessary to omit a considerable amount of apparatus from its specifications as they were approved by my associate, Mr. Putnam, who represented me here. Unless those omissions are replaced in the near future the plant, in my judgment, would be better left unbuilt. It is presumably the intention of the department to make this replacement in whole or in part so as to make the plant an operative plant."

These views are further verified by Mr. Cass Gilbert, architect of the great Woolworth Building, which is not only an architectural triumph but an engineering one as well. In the Woolworth Building are installed 2,500-horsepower boilers for elevator, light, and heat service, the elevator service being an engineering transportation feat. In his testimony before the Library Committee, Mr. Gilbert says, page 38 of the hearings:

"I would like, while I am on my feet, to say one more word. There are a great many engineering questions which we believe could be properly studied—and I mean no reflection upon the engineers who have been over it, but I mean if broadly studied, that is the better word—broadly studied in all their relation to Washington from every standpoint of use of various fuels, oil-producer gas, hard coal, distant transmission, electric heating, air-tube system for some local place like Lincoln Memorial, which needs no stack, operated by gas flames as in the New Haven Public Library or the Spalding Building in Portland, Oreg., where power is transmitted, as well as light, from a distance. A local plant in a 13-story building without a boiler plant in it or a particle of steam can be applied to the Lincoln Memorial, for example, and possibly to some of the minor buildings, although it could not well be applied to old buildings.

"That would solve the small local problems advantageously and economically, but first get at the details and have the whole situation in Washington studied."

In my letter of the 13th to the Library Committee I indicate that I consider the American Society of Civil Engineers, American Institute of Electrical Engineers, American Institute of Mechanical Engineers, American Institute of Mining Engineers, Association of Consulting Engineers, and the American Institute of Architects would be willing to form a commission and that eminent, distinguished, and competent members would act as an advisory committee. Since writing that letter I have communicated with some officials of these societies and find they are desirous of freely giving such service to their country if they are given a cordial invitation and accorded due recognition.

Of course other methods of making a right investigation of this problem may occur to you, and I desire my suggestions to be considered most tentative. What, however, must be apparent from the facts and statements herein presented is that the power plants and other power consumers of the Government in this District deserve united Federal treatment and should not be given capricious departmental boundaries which may not accord with engineering verities.

The investigation should not be shirked on account of the contract already entered into. A visit to the site at the present time shows that an expenditure of not more than $2,000 or $3,000 has been made in connection with the excavation and minor equipment on the ground. Probably reasonable arrangements could be made to retain the contractor's services in connection with the enlargement of the navy yard and the Capitol plants or any new work decided upon. Also, the material he has under order may be so used and modified to fit in with the new work. Indemnity for delay in the work would, of course, be his due, but at this state the contractor's loss per diem for such delay can not be very great. Contrast any reasonable indemnity to be paid with the possibility of eliminating one unnecessary plant and of making use of more extensive plants already erected, for the construction of which the Government has expended considerably over $2,300,000.

Yours, respectfully,

HENNEN JENNINGS,
Civil and Mining Engineer.

The total estimated coal consumption of the Federal and District Governments per year is—

Bituminous	157,890 tons, costing	$496,839
Anthracite	44,290 tons, costing	233,544
Total	202,180 tons, costing	730,383

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, so much time has elapsed and so much has been said upon other subjects since I presented the amendment and made the observations I did yesterday upon it, I feel that I ought to restate the effect of the amendment. I do not intend to repeat the argument with which I endeavored to sustain the proposal yesterday.

I say in the first place, after listening to the argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which was not directed to my amendment at all, if I felt there was any possibility of introducing into the bill the measure of compensation which he proposes, namely, the cost of the property to the grantee, I would be heartily for it. I declared yesterday, and I repeat, that I believe that in all such projects as are here presented the true rule is the cost to the grantee and not the value of the property as it is ascertained by courts under proceedings to take private property for public use.

I assume that the amendment of the Senator from Montana will be before the Senate before the bill is disposed of, and I desire to say now that I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure and with a sense that I am rendering a real service to the people of the country.

My amendment reaches the same end, however, in a little different way. I presented it in this form because I had some hope that if I yielded to the general drift of the bill I might be able to secure its adoption, and might be able in this way to eliminate values which in my judgment are entirely illegitimate, values which if the people of the country are compelled to pay will bring this bill into utter disrepute.

My amendment proposes, first, therefore, to limit the rule of valuation to the physical property of the grantee. I intend by that qualification to eliminate all intangible value. I intend to eliminate the value of the water right. I intend to eliminate the value of the property measured by the results of a particular business. I intend to eliminate a consideration of the profits which might be earned in the operation of the property.

I of course do not eliminate the availability or the fitness of the particular property to carry on a certain enterprise.

With much that has been said by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] I am in accord, but he presents one analysis of the subject with which I can not agree, if I understand him correctly. We are granting a permit to obstruct a navigable stream or to place a structure in a navigable stream for a period of 50 years. The Senator from Montana seems to be of the opinion that at the end of the period the grantee would have the right, aside from the provisions of the bill, to be paid by somebody for the property considered as a structure or development for the generation of power. I do not think so. I think that at the end of the period the United States would have the right to command the grantee to dismantle the property; I think the United States would have the right to direct the grantee to remove the property, whatever it may be, from the stream. The grantee is only permitted to occupy the stream by the terms of the bill, and the very moment the permission is lawfully withdrawn, or the moment the period of the permission expires, that moment the whole structure becomes a nuisance and an unlawful intrusion upon a navigable stream.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is no difference of opinion between the Senator from Iowa and myself with respect to the structures which occupy the stream; there is no doubt about that proposition; but the power plant itself, the generation works, all the works outside the dam, would not be in the stream at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the qualification just suggested by the Senator from Montana, his statement is entirely accurate, as I understand it; but, at any rate, so far as the stream is concerned, we are binding the United States to an obligation which would not exist if it were not for the terms of the bill.

I said yesterday that I was in favor of making the grantee whole; but the grantee will be made whole, so far as that is concerned, if the United States pays to him the value of the physical property, without respect to the earning capacity of the enterprise and without respect to the water rights which the grantee may have secured from the State or from a riparian owner. I submit to Senators, why should the United States pay more at least than the value of the physical property?

My second proposal in the amendment which will be voted on immediately is that with regard to that part of the improvement which is solely for the development of navigation, the United States shall be required to pay only the original cost of the property without interest. I am afraid—and further reflection upon the matter has rather emphasized the fear—that the word "cost," as used in the bill before us, will be construed to mean cost with interest, and that we will be required to pay for a cost invested in, we will say, 1916, interest for 50 years when we come to take over the property.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I do not think the Government would have to pay interest on the cost, because the grantee would have been getting the benefit of the improvement in question all the time, and, therefore, he should not have the interest upon the cost.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the grantee should have no interest upon the cost. Is the Senator from Tennessee willing to accept my amendment in that respect?

Mr. SHIELDS. As to that particular part, I would have no objection, but I could not accept the amendment as a whole. If, however, the Senator will offer another amendment merely to insert those words after the payment of costs, I would not have any objection to that.

Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me in this connection, I may state that I was not able to hear all of the remarks of the Senator, for, as he knows, I have been in the Chamber since 12 o'clock without lunch, and I retired from the Chamber to get some lunch; but I understand since I have come in, and in connection with what I did hear the Senator say after I got into the Chamber, that the contention is that this bill contemplates that the grantee shall receive compensation for rights that he acquires under the bill over the public lands for the construction of the dam or the site or for transmission lines. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] misunderstood the bill entirely, because all of those rights, which the bill provides may be granted by the Secretary of War, expire with the expiration of the permit, whether it be in 50 years or at the time that the United States gives notice. Under the provisions of the bill the grantee is entitled to no compensation for any interest he may have obtained from the Secretary of War in any lands belonging to the United States, and no compensation can be allowed him for such interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into the argument between the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Montana upon that point. It is really foreign to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say further to the Senator that if the bill does not make it clear that the permittee is not to have those rights I shall myself offer an amendment to so provide; but I think when the rights terminate the permittee can not have compensation for a thing that is nonexistent, that expires by limitation.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee is replying to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought my remarks were germane at this point.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will fasten his mind upon the amendment that I have offered, which is now under consideration.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will offer no objections to another amendment limited to excluding any interest on the cost of the locks and other structures that the bill provides the permittee may have.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Tennessee has advanced far enough to exclude interest upon costs.

Mr. SHIELDS. I never for one moment contemplated that interest would be allowed, or any such thing, and the bill does not so provide. No member of the committee ever contemplated such a thing as that interest would be allowed on this capital expense required by the Secretary of War, because the permittee gets the benefit of it at the time the interest would be accruing. He gets the use of all of the works, and, as a matter of fact, he should have no interest on them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not know what the committee intended; I can only infer what it meant by as careful a study as possible of the language which it used; but it matters not, inasmuch as the Senator from Tennessee has given us the assurance that in so far at least the amendment shall be adopted.

The third radical change that is made in this section by my amendment is to relieve the United States of the obligation of contracts which may have been made by the grantee, and which extend beyond the period of 50 years; that is, extend beyond the time at which the franchise expires. I gave my reasons for that yesterday, and I do not intend to repeat them. I submit that the section itself, as qualified or modified by the amendment which I have proposed, will do full justice to the grantee and will do at least partial justice to the public.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who I now find is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. WALSH. I have a pair with that Senator and voted, not noting his absence from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HOLLIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted not noticing that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was absent from the Chamber. I have a pair with him. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the temporary absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Husting	Newlands	Sterling
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Vardaman
Cummins	Lane	Poindexter	Walsh
Gore	Lee, Md.	Reed

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to offer an amendment which I have already debated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in presenting on yesterday the amendment just voted upon I referred to and discussed with some care another amendment which is connected with section 6. I think it would tend to a quick disposition of the matter if I were to offer the amendment now. I offer it and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That if in the operation of the property for which, under the foregoing provision, the United States is required to pay it shall appear that it has earned during the period of use by the grantee, or his assignee or successor, a surplus over and above cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation of that part of the property valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, taxes, and other fixed charges, including bonded indebtedness and such reasonable return upon the remainder of the capital invested, not including investment from earnings, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, then the amount of such surplus shall be deducted from the aggregate of the fair value and original cost as above ascertained, and the United States shall be required to pay only the balance so resulting: Provided further, That in order to facilitate the ascertainment of the amount of such surplus to be so deducted the Secretary of War is authorized to require from the grantee, his assignee or successor, such annual reports as will set forth the information material to such inquiry and ascertainment

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, again I say that I do not intend to repeat the discussion of yesterday with respect to the amendment I have just offered. I can hardly hope that it will be favorably received, inasmuch as the amendment which I offered yesterday has been voted down. Nevertheless, I reckon it to be my duty to present the amendment and to ask the opinion of the Senate upon it.

The amendment that has just been read means this: That from the value of the property which the United States is to take over at the end of the franchise period, as ascertained under the rules which the committee has reported in the bill—which I look upon as sure to result in an exaggerated value—if the grantee has actually earned during the period of his privilege a sum that has paid all the costs of maintenance and of operation, all the fixed charges, all the interest upon bonded debt, and a fair and reasonable return upon the remainder of the capital invested in the business, and has accumulated a surplus above all these items of expenditure and reward, then such surplus shall be deducted from the value of the property as ascertained in the previous part of the section.

The amendment simply means that if the people who are served through the water power or water distribution, whatever it may be, have paid enough not only to maintain the enterprise and reward the capital invested in it, but to accumulate a fund in addition, they shall not be compelled to pay twice. In paying the charges that are sufficient to accumulate a fund of that character, they have paid just that much more than they should have paid; and if the utilities commissions throughout the country fail to regulate with that accuracy which will result in charges that are reasonable and fair, or in the event that the enterprise is of a character subject to no regulation whatever, the United States shall not pay again a sum which the people to whom the service has been rendered have once paid.

I could not make the subject plainer if I were to discuss it for hours. I plead for this little justice to the people of the United States; and, although others may want to discuss it, I shall ask now for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Toledo, Ohio, and a petition of the Minnesota State Federation of Labor, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of L. W. Hitchcock, of Durham, N. H., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Baptist Congregational Church, of Greenville, N. H., and a petition of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Laconia, N. H., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of R. G. Diman, of Manchester, N. H., praying for the extension of military training in civil educational institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Canton, Miss., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Haven, West Haven, Bridgeport, and Meriden, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of Loyalty Council, No. 52, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Somers; of the Central Labor Union of Willimantic; of the Trades Council of New Haven; of Local Union No. 159, Bartenders' Union, of Meriden; and of sundry citizens of Ridgefield, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions of the congregations of the Swedish Baptist Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the First Baptist Church, and of the Epworth League, all of Meriden, in the State of Connecticut, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Lyra Singing Society, of Meriden, Conn., remonstrating against prohibition in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Lyra Singing Society, of Meriden, Conn., praying for a revision of the naturalization laws, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Pastors' Association of Bridgeport and a petition of citizens of Seymour and Chesire, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Lyra Singing Society, of Meriden, Conn., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maryland, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Rev. J. G. Fleck, of Baltimore, Md., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of Rev. J. G. Fleck, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate transmission of race gambling odds and bets, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Pressmen's Union of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LIPPITT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Rhode Island Society, of Providence, R. I., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Rhode Island Society, of Providence, R. I., praying for the erection of a national archives building, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the City Council of Oakland, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the enlargement of the post-office building at that city, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Mendocino, Cal., praying for the construction of a national-defense highway, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Down Town Association of San Francisco, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Yosemite National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of Davis Lake Grange, No. 501, Patrons of Husbandry, of Dalkena, Wash., and a memorial of Local Grange No. 236, Patrons of Husbandry, of Sterling, Wash., remonstrating against the creation of a system of rural credits, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Willapa Harbor Trades and Labor Council, of Raymond, Wash., remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the so-called seamen's law, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 4746) for the relief of the Protestant Orphan Asylum at Natchez, Miss.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 4747) granting an increase of pension to Levi J. Richardson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4748) for the relief of August Donnerberg; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4749) for the relief of Franklin Buchanan Sullivan; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 4750) for the relief of the Ninth West Columbia Permanent Building Association, of Baltimore, Md.; and

A bill (S. 4751) for the relief of the State Mutual Building Association, Baltimore, Md.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4752) for the relief of Gertrude M. Woodson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 4754) granting a pension to Lucius V. Hubbard;

A bill (S. 4755) granting an increase of pension to Miranda A. Wheelock;

A bill (S. 4756) granting a pension to Sarah S. Humiston;

A bill (S. 4757) granting a pension to Laurence E. Johnson; and

A bill (S. 4758) granting a pension to Karl S. Newstrom; to the Committee on Pensions.

IMPROVEMENT OF BALTIMORE HARBOR, MD.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $910,100 for the improvement and maintenance of the harbor at Baltimore, Md., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 12193), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m., Thursday, March 2, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 3, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, from whose loving heart a holy influence is ever pouring itself out for the inspiration, purification, and ennobling of souls. "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with Me." May we open our hearts and receive that spirit and be cleansed from all guile.

Never was there a time in the history of our Republic when unanimity of thought and action were more needed than to-day. Never was there a time when clear vision, noble endeavor, and purity of purpose were more needed than to-day. Hear our prayer, O Lord, and enter into our souls with all Thy quickening power, and we shall praise and magnify Thy holy Name through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage of Senators, $51,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Cox: Page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "$51,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$12,750," and add:

"Hereafter Senators shall be paid at the rate of 5 cents per mile while traveling from their homes to Washington City and return by the usual and ordinary route of travel, once at each session of Congress."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I regretted very much that the Committee on Appropriations reported this bill to the House without including this amendment, which, if I remember correctly, it favorably reported to the House heretofore on two different occasions. This is the ordinary amendment, which has heretofore been offered to this provision, and is the same one which the Committee on Appropriations have reported at least once heretofore.

I am not disposed to discuss this question extensively at all. If it becomes a law every Member of this House will be paid his full traveling expenses. In fact, under the proposed amendment he will be paid more than his legitimate traveling expenses from one end of this country to the other. This is the same amount of travel pay that is allowed to all witnesses while going to Federal courts, and is practically the same amount of travel pay which the United States gives to all of its ambassadors while traveling from this country abroad and return.

Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill that has created quite a sensation, especially in the newspapers, for the last few days. That is what is known as the Borland amendment. That amendment can only be sustained upon one ground, either in morals or in law, and the ground upon which it can be sustained is that of economy. I think its author claims that it will save this Government between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 per year. I am constrained to agree with him upon that point; that if the Borland amendment finally becomes a law, it will work considerable economy in the expenditures of the Government. If ever there was a time in the history of our Government when our country ought to economize, that time is certainly now. Of course the argument will be made, before this mileage provision is finally disposed of, that it is a small, insignificant sum of money. Yet everyone knows well that you can not save money on these appropriation bills by countless millions of dollars, but money can be and often is saved by watching the small items of appropriations.

I place this amendment, therefore, upon the ground of economy, and upon the further ground that no Member is entitled to more money in the way of traveling expenses than his legitimate expenses. Personally I would prefer to see the Members paid their actual traveling expenses from their homes to Washington City and return, but I recognize that that would involve considerable bookkeeping. There might be some question raised about it later on. The amendment which I have offered involves no system of bookkeeping any more than is now required. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will carry.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. COX. I can not yield now. If I remember correctly, two years ago upon the legislative bill this amendment was sustained by this House four times upon a yea-and-nay vote. Of course, the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol defeated it, and it was only in the very closing hours of the session, on the 27th or 28th of June, when men of influence in the House took the floor in opposition to the amendment, upon the ground that the Congress of the United States could not afford to let this great supply bill, carrying $35,000,000 or $40,000,000, fail solely because of the item of mileage, and by a narrow margin of only nine votes this House finally receded from its former position.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have supported and advocated a reduction of mileage. My views and convictions upon the subject have not changed. I have always believed that there should be a reduction. Twice heretofore the Committee on Appropriations has brought into this House a provision upon the legislative appropriation bill recommending that the mileage be reduced to actual traveling expenses. That provision was adopted each time by the House. It has gone to the other end of the Capitol, and as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has stated, after repeated efforts each time the provision has failed, and has not been incorporated in the law. I know that the Committee on Appropriations have not changed their views upon this subject. There was some discussion in the committee, and some difference of opinion, it is true, as to exactly what kind of a reduction should be made. Personally I have always favored and do favor a reduction to 5 cents a mile. I think that would be sufficient to cover the actual expenses of travel from our homes to Washington and return.

This matter, of course, is really a question of legislation, and, under the rules of the House, properly belongs to the legislative Committee on Mileage, which has jurisdiction of the matter. As I have stated, the Committee on Appropriations have, notwithstanding, twice heretofore brought this recommendation before the House, and each time have not met with success. After all it is a question for this House and for the Senate to say whether this reduction shall be made.

It was my privilege to suggest to the legislative Committee on Mileage through its chairman that a bill be reported, so that it might be placed on the calendar and considered and sent to the Senate for consideration there, because it is the contention of those at the other end of the Capitol that this matter should be brought up in the regular legislative way. That was one of the chief objections made by the Senate to the provision reducing mileage adopted by the House last year and the year before. I regret that the legislative committee has not submitted a bill on this subject.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What is to hinder the gentleman from Tennessee from introducing such a bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that I have introduced such a bill, and have introduced one every term of Congress since I have been a Member.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What is the status of the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is in committee, and I was expressing my regret that some bill on the subject, whether mine or some other, has not been reported to the House and placed on the calendar. I have always been consistently in favor of this legislation. I was in favor of it two years ago and I was in favor of it a year ago, and, personally, I was in favor of having it in this bill at this time. I regret very much that it is not. I have never seen any reason why Members of Congress should draw the amount they do under the term of "mileage," for it is, of course, a greater amount than is required for a trip and return. I do not take the position that it is illegal or unfair or improper to draw the amount under the present law, because the law provides a certain amount for mileage, and it is entirely proper and right for Members of Congress to draw the amount given by law. But I do think that Congress ought to take the matter up and consider it. I believe that Congress ought to make a proper reduction in accordance with the actual expenses required to bring us here and take us home.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the bill to which the gentleman refers before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it is before the Committee on Mileage, which has legislative jurisdiction. The Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction of it.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the matter with the Committee on Mileage?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not answer that question; but I hope the Committee on Mileage will give due and proper consideration to these bills. I would like to see the amendment adopted and another effort made to pass it through the Senate as a part of this appropriation bill, although I realize full well that the objection will be again made that it should come up in a regular bill. It is for that reason I had hoped that the Committee on Mileage would have reported either the bill introduced by me or some other, so that the matter might be presented to the Senate free from this objection, which has always been raised in the past.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, for the last five years at every session of Congress somebody has introduced an amendment to reduce the mileage of Senators and Members of the House. This amendment will eliminate all mileage to either Senators or Representatives. We are either entitled to a sufficient amount of money to defray the ordinary expenses of the trip to bring our wives and families to and from Washington or we are not entitled to anything, one or the other. You ought to have this question thrashed out, for I know Member after Member on the floor of this House on a roll call last year voted "aye" when he was hoping and praying to the Lord at the time he voted that the Senate would kill it. [Laughter and applause.] That is pure, unadulterated demagogy. We are either entitled to the mileage or we are not entitled to it; and I for one will vote to eliminate the entire amount, or I will vote for an adequate amount for the purpose of bringing our families to Washington with us. [Applause.]

As far as I am concerned, I voted last year to sustain the 20-cent mile rate. I try to be as conscientious as any man, and I found out that there was no surplus left as far as my own personal expenses was concerned when I had made the trip to and from my district to the Capital and paid for excess baggage, and so forth. There is only one of two things for this House to do, either be men enough to say that we are honest and getting no more than we are entitled to or vote to eliminate every penny of mileage. As far as I am concerned I hope that the substitute I have offered will be adopted by this House and forever and a day eliminate this always agitated question of mileage and leaving the impression upon the minds of the people that their Senators and Congressmen are a crowd of petty grafters.

Now, this is a big thing to go to your district with; go down and say, "I voted to cut down my own mileage," when, as a matter of fact, your people or mine do not care a picayune about this proposition, so it is just and equitable. That is the truth about it, and I am getting tired of it. It is embarrassing to Members of this House to have the question of their own pay brought up ever session of Congress and parade it over the country that we are getting something out of the Public Treasury we are not entitled to or that our pay is exorbitant. When you take the expenses of maintaining two homes, paying for extra services in the discharge of your duties, paying for documents, meeting the demands of the political committees in assessments, meeting the never-ending demand for donations to every public enterprise at home, where is the Member who has a penny left for his family at the end of each month?

Now, the present amount of mileage has been in the law for years. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], sitting near me, says he hopes and prays to the Lord that it will stay there. [Laughter.] That is the way you all feel about it. That is the way the gentleman from Indiana feels about it. [Laughter.] What is the use of playing to the grandstand about this question of mileage? Either eliminate it or have the courage and manhood to vote an adequate amount to bring our wives and children here so that we can all be contented Representatives of this Government, because I tell you right here and now that the man who does not bring his wife and family with him is criticized—sometimes. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations reported the 20-cent mileage, but so far as I am concerned personally, I have never in committee or on the floor of the House voted for the 20 cents a mile; nor do I believe that the gentleman from Georgia in assuming the rôle of critic in censoring Members is altogether fair. I believe the gentleman from Indiana is as sincere in his position as those who are clamoring for the 20 cents a mile.

It is right interesting to look at the history of this entire matter. When mileage was discussed in the First Congress the question of fixing mileage turned on this principle that every Member of Congress should have an equal compensation for services which he rendered his Government; and, in the location of the Capital here upon the banks of the Potomac River, those men believed then that men should be paid and have compensation for their services, and they fixed the compensation at about the expense of the then mode of travel, so that the man in Maine and the man in Virginia would get the same salary, net, for services to the people. Since that time methods of travel have gotten to be cheap, and men now are actually making money out of the mileage. Those who live near Washington, of course, get but very little compensation, although they make money on the short trip. The purpose of mileage originally was that every man should receive equal pay for his services as a Member of Congress. If a man goes home two or three times during the year, he may use money which has been paid to him on this mileage appropriation; but the statute now provides that there shall be paid for one trip the distance from their home to the Capital and return, and it is carried in the language in which it has been carried for many, many years, which of itself is convincing that originally Congress intended to pay men for their actual traveling expenses.

The majority of the Committee on Appropriations agrees that this matter has been before the House repeatedly, and that, although the House has on two different occasions reduced the mileage from 20 cents to 10 cents, it has gone to the Senate, and that the fight had been a useless one, and so the majority of the committee reported the bill. Those gentlemen who reported it are just as conscientious as the men who do not favor it, and the Committee on Appropriations, in bringing in this item, were just as sincere as they were when they brought in the item on the two preceding occasions fixing it at 10 cents a mile. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be very glad to see the mileage fixed upon a basis of actual compensation; but there is one thing that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] said that I agree to, and that is that, rather than have this matter at every session of Congress, I would cut it out entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this proposition of mileage ought to be considered on a business, common-sense basis. Under the present arrangement it is clearly manifest that some Members of Congress receive more money out of their salaries and mileage than others. For instance, if an unmarried man happens to be a Member of Congress, he can save more money out of his mileage than if he be married. If he be a married man, as he ought to be, and brings his wife and children with him, as he ought to do, he loses money frequently on the mileage allowance. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of my colleague from Indiana [Mr. Cox], that mileage be reduced to 5 cents a mile, seems to me as not the best plan. It ought to be based upon the actual traveling expenses of the Member of Congress. All the other Government officials are paid their traveling expenses in that way; and if my recollection serves me right, even the President of the United States has an allotment, or did have at one time, for mileage, on condition that he render from time to time a statement or certificate of his traveling expenses.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The provision is that the President's mileage is expended only on his own certificate. No detailed statement is rendered.

Mr. BARNHART. It is an implied statement, as an itemized bill would not be asked of the President of the United States, but impliedly it is a statement of such expenditure. If all other officials of the Government are requested to make a statement of their mileage expenses, it seems to me that the sensible and businesslike way to arrange this matter of mileage, so that it would be settled for all time, would be to put it upon the basis of actual traveling expenses, as itemized to the paymaster of Congress.

One other thing I desire to say. I believe that if Members of Congress are paid actual traveling expenses for themselves, then every Member who is provided with a clerk ought to have paid the actual traveling expenses of that clerk from his home to the city of Washington, and for this reason: No Member of Congress can find a clerk in the city of Washington, if he come from the Pacific coast or from other far-distant point in this country, who can render him services that a man from home, who knows the people and conditions of his community, can render; and, therefore, I believe that when this matter is finally considered it ought to be upon the business basis of actual expenses, and that a Congressman's clerk ought to be alike paid his traveling expenses.

Mr. CANNON. And also that of his wife?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; that would be a just arrangement, and then we would all be paid alike.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I know of but one course to pursue, so far as I am concerned, and that is to do my duty as I see it. I have never criticized, I have never impugned the motives or the vote of any Member of Congress when he has voted for 20 cents a mile, either in the Halls of Congress or back home, and while the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is an exceedingly bright man, while I concede to him that he is almost upon the border line between the finite and the infinite, and able to read the minds and the thoughts and interpret the motives of men, yet so far as I am concerned I deny that right to him. I have been sincere, and while I have voted for this proposition time and time again, and while I propose to vote for it while I am in Congress, I am not one of the Members of this House whom he characterizes as running over to the Senate, swinging on a Senator's coal tail, and praying Almighty God that that body will defeat it. I said a moment ago that I only know one course for me to pursue, and that is to do my duty, and I accord the same privilege to every Member of this House, and when they vote upon this or any other proposition I will deem it as conclusive proof that they are sincere, and whatever action the Senate may take upon this proposition now or in the future, or whatever action it has taken in the past, I shall give them due credit for being sincere in what they have done.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend any reflection upon the gentleman from Indiana or impugn his sincerity in this matter at all, but I just want to call attention of the new Members of this House to a scene I witnessed on this floor in a former Congress. On a rising vote I saw gentlemen here in the last Congress vote for an increase in mileage. Then on a yea and nay vote I heard those same gentlemen very vociferously declare that they were against any increase in mileage when they were recorded, and that was the reason I said what I did.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return."

Mr. HOWARD. That is an old Charles Wesley hymn which is good doctrine for the gentleman to follow as to his conduct in the future. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the substitute be again reported.

Mr. MANN. Let both propositions be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the Clerk will report the substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The substitute was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, technically, yes; debate has been exhausted.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, my first public service was rendered as reading clerk in one of the two houses of the Indiana General Assembly. Five times I served in that capacity, and rightly or wrongly I conceived the idea then that the man who talked the least rendered the finest public service. [Applause.] I probably carried my conviction to the extreme. Time after time, seven times, the question of mileage has been discussed in this House, and I have kept silent, except for half a minute when a sort of spontaneous combustion carried me off my feet. I made a brief statement then and afterwards withdrew it from the RECORD. But I served notice then on the men who bring this question up time after time that they must either fight to a finish then, and that meant that they must defeat this mileage of 20 cents a mile, even if it were necessary to defeat this bill, or that I, at least, would quit putting myself in a position where I had to defend myself against the charge of being a demagogue.

I went back home to the finest district on this earth. [Applause.] I went back to people who are intelligent, who want me to do right, and who would be ashamed to have me do that which they believe is a mockery and a false pretense.

Why, before I quit being reading clerk in the Indiana Legislature, where we have the same mileage of 20 cents, everybody in my district, when there was talk about somebody being in favor of cutting the mileage, just laughed.

Now, my friends, here is the truth about this situation. Mileage is part of our compensation. It is based upon the number of miles in an attempt to equalize an inequality that inheres in every flat salary paid to Members of this House. The amount is not big enough to do it, but it tends to do it. If we are paid too much, we ought to have the courage to say so and take it from the flat rate, but do not take it from the mileage, the only thing that tends even to equalize conditions between the man who lives near by and the man who lives far away. That was the idea, that was the underlying principle. There are not 10 men in this House this afternoon who believe that Members of Congress are being paid too much. If they believe it, why then strike down the salary of $7,500 to $7,300 or $7,000 or to $6,500 or to $6,000, anything you want to. I will not join you, because I do not believe it ought to be stricken down one cent—but I will take off my hat to the man who does that. Such action by a Member of this House would impel me to say in my heart, if not here on the floor, "maybe that man is in dead earnest." [Applause.] At any rate, I would be compelled to admit that his proposition does not carry with it an inherent and inevitable injustice.

Now, my friends, that is all I care to say. I will not vote to reduce the mileage a cent. [Applause.] For seven years I voted with these men because I thought in their districts there might be a political necessity. They are my friends; I love them, and I will do almost anything to keep them here, because if they leave their successors will not be as good men, and yet if they keep on acting as they are acting to-day and they are elected to succeed themselves, their successors will not be as good men then as the present Members now are. I state the truth when I say that every time a man sacrifices any of his self-respect, he ceases to be as good a man as he was before. After this vote is taken this House will be made up of men not as good as they are now, because a lot of us shall have torn away considerable fragments of our self-respect and thrown them as unwelcome sacrifices to a popular prejudice more imaginary than real. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, the newspapers call this a graft. I do not blame them. A majority of every legislative body I have ever seen has pretended to believe it was graft, but I have never known of any man yet who did not go and get his money. [Laughter.] Seven times I voted to reduce this mileage; seven times I went and got my money, but the fellows who made the noise on this floor beat me to it. [Laughter and applause.] In my campaigns men would say to me, "Did you vote to reduce mileage?" and then, with a hangdog look, I would say, "Yes." And then they would say, "Did you get your money?" "Yes." "Did you believe you were entitled to it?" "Yes." "Why did you vote to reduce it? The men who made speeches said it was dishonest, it was graft, it was looting the Treasury, and why did you vote with the men who said that?" I said that I did it because they were my friends and I wanted to save them from embarrassing conditions local to their districts. I did not have to do it in my district, because my district had been educated on this mileage proposition and was so educated long before I thought of being a candidate for Congress.

But I want to come back to the original proposition. Mileage is compensation. That is all. The man who comes from far away has many expenses that the man who lives near by does not have. The present mileage does not equalize it, but it tends to equalize it. A man who is a man among men, a man who is a man of family, a man who is a part of his community, a part of its industries, a part of its commerce, a part of its public life, must go back home again and again, and he must take a part in those activities, and in order to do it he must incur expenses. Are you going to penalize him because he is a man among men and place a premium upon a fellow who neither knows nor cares? I am against this proposition, because it involves an inference that we have been getting too much pay. I do not believe it, but if we have, let us take it from the $7,500. Let us not strike down the only proposition that tends to equalize an inequality that grows out of the geography of the case.

I have been here nearly eight years. I have not served my people at a financial sacrifice, but I have served them the best I knew how. I have not wrecked myself financially. But let me talk about the other men who came in 1909. They will soon be eight years older. They will have practically no income except their salaries and mileage. Probably many will have practically no earning capacity. Perhaps they will never have one again. Perhaps they have laid nothing aside as a safeguard against the risk of sickness and disaster and the certainty of old age. Have we been getting too much? No Member of this House thinks so. To vote that 20 cents is too much is to vote that we are not willing to trust the good sense and conscience of the American people. And my judgment is that their good judgment and their good conscience is more to be risked than were the judgment and the conscience of the men who were in the legislature in Indiana 15 or 20 years ago and who made this fight at every session vigorously and with delightful inability and failure.

But I do say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, and I want to say it with all the earnestness of my soul, that this House is suffering tremendously from just such things as this. [Applause.] This House is deteriorating, partly by the change of membership which results from bringing in new Members and partly by successive diminutions of the self-respect and moral courage of its present Members. You and I pay poor tribute to our people by presuming that they do not know and are not intelligent. And so, day after day, a reign of terror sweeps over this House and we chisel away a little more and tear away a little more of our independence and our self-respect until we have nothing left of them but a wreck and a remnant. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 150.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage of Representatives, Delegates, and expenses of Resident Commissioners, $175,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 9, strike out the figures "$175,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$43,750," and add the following:

"Hereafter Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be paid at the rate of 5 cents per mile while traveling from their homes to Washington City and return by the usual and ordinary routes of travel once each regular session of Congress."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The argument has been made here this morning that this mileage is a part of the compensation of Members of Congress. Anyone who has looked this question up knows that is not true. The Court of Claims five or six years ago in a decision rendered squarely upon this mileage provision distinctly held that it was no part of the compensation of the Members of Congress; that the original object and the primary purpose of the 20 cents a mile was for travel-pay compensation to be paid to Members for travel. That is the law to-day; and whoever undertakes to argue upon the floor of this House or elsewhere that the amount of mileage allowed to each Member of Congress is a part of his compensation argues in the face of the supreme law of the land, because that decision is binding upon all of us until it is appealed from and reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. And it has never been appealed from and it has never been reversed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said a while ago, and I wish to repeat, I have never undertaken to harpoon any man upon this proposition. I have never undertaken to lambast him upon the floor of the House or elsewhere. It is a question that appeals to the individual conscience of each and every Member of this House. If he wants to vote for it, all right; if he wants to vote against it, he is just as good a Member and just as patriotic as I dare be.

The viewpoint of life changes the whole current of human events, and I have never cast a vote in the eight years that I have served in this House that I have been ashamed of; and while I am a candidate now, I would vote for this provision if it were the last vote I ever intended to cast in my life. Because Members have announced in their districts that they are no longer candidates for Congress, now they come out in the open and publicly declare that they are against this provision. I am for it, whether I am a candidate or not. I think it is right. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I have a genuine affection for my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, WILLIAM ELIJAH Cox. He is a valuable Member of this House. [Applause.] He is industrious. He is honest. He is intelligent. He has rendered great service to the people of his district and to the country. He conceived, planned, and carried out remedial legislation that has been worth millions and millions of dollars to the Federal Treasury and that in the years to come will be worth hundreds of millions of dollars to the Federal Treasury.

And yet I doubt whether 10 men in the third Indiana district know that when they sent WILLIAM ELIJAH Cox to this House they were conferring upon the people of this country an advantage, the advantage that comes from honest service and intelligent service, and a particular financial advantage in one case amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. But the newspapers have made the word "mileage" synonymous with the word "Cox." It is unjust to my friend, who in everything that is great and large and fine is himself great and large and fine, and has permitted the newspapers of this country so to connect him with this paltry proposition that his neighbors do not know how great a man they have sent to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

I say that with all the earnestness in my soul I regret this situation. If I were going into his district in the next campaign I would say, "Now, boys, do not hold that against him. A lot of other men who are all right did the same thing." Then I would tell them the truth, and then, I dare say, they would be proud of the man who they now think is identified with a small proposition which in seven years has gotten nowhere.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one other word. My friend did not mean to say anything about the man who announced that he would not be a candidate. I am sure he did not mean to be personal. Perhaps it is a mistake for a man to announce that he will not be a candidate. I believe most Members are afraid to do it for fear they will be taken seriously. [Laughter.] I did it seriously, and I meant it. But there is not a Member of this House that does not remember, in the Sixty-third Congress, an incident, less than a minute long, that made it perfectly plain that I had then put myself in a false position, for the last time, candidate or no candidate. I presume that from now on the fact that I am not a candidate will make it a calamity for me to say what nine men out of ten know that they ought to say, and what nine out of ten believe they ought to do. But at the expense, perhaps, of losing the good opinion of men who may be candidates for reelection, I am going to do my duty as I see it, and I will not play horse any more on this peanut proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Cox: Page 12, line 9, strike out the figures "$175,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$43,750," and add the following:

"Hereafter Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be paid at the rate of 5 cents per mile while traveling from their homes to Washington City and return by the usual and ordinary routes of travel once each session of Congress."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $175,000 for mileage to Members of Congress and Delegates and Resident Commissioners for two sessions of Congress, constituting one term. That would be $350,000 for a Congress. Now, I have a suggestion which I believe, if I can engage the attention of the House, will possibly be accepted as a happy compromise of this eternal controversy about mileage.

In that connection let me say that, not solely through cowardice but partly as a matter of judgment, I have always voted to reduce the mileage allowance, and yet I am not one of those who believes that the membership of this House receives from the Federal Government too much money for the service rendered.

The fact is, in these busy days when the people of the United States have learned everywhere that a Member of Congress is in fact a public servant here, to serve as well as to represent them, we are flooded daily with mail. On many, many matters, almost beyond the comprehension of man to conceive of, we are called upon to look after and attend to the business of our constituents.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard the statement made, and this membership has heard the statement time and time again, that various and sundry Members every month must go down into their pockets and pay for extra help in their offices. I speak advisedly when I say I know this is true, and I could furnish conclusive proof of the fact. I believe the time has come when Congress should economize along every line, but should expend such sums as may be necessary to enable faithful servants of the people to discharge the various and important burdens and duties devolving upon them.

My suggestion is this: If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] should be adopted—and I will vote for it—it would make the appropriation for mileage for the two sessions approximately $88,000 instead of $350,000. If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is agreed to, I will at the proper place in this bill offer for the consideration of the committee this amendment:

For pay of each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for stenographer hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and Representative duties, at $60 per month during the session of Congress, $105,360, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I have made roughly here, and quickly, a calculation, allowing seven months for a long session of Congress. Stenographic hire at this rate would amount to $184,380 for the long session. For the short session, allowing four months for the short session—and it is really one month too long—at $600 per month, stenographic hire would amount to $105,360, or a total during the two sessions of $289,740. Now, if we would add to this sum mileage computed upon the basis which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] seeks to have established, namely, 5 cents a mile, we would have mileage amounting, approximately, to $88,000, or a total of $377,000 a term of two sessions for mileage and pay for stenographic service, which would be only $25,000 more than we pay now, and would give each and every Member of Congress the services of a stenographer, paid for by the Government, and thereby enable us to do more and better work without the embarrassment of paying for it out of private funds.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, this would be in addition to the Member's clerk hire?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly. In addition to the clerks that we now have, at $1,500 a year. I would give each Member a session stenographer at $60 a month, if he actually employs one; and, of course, not a cent unless he does employ one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I may have occasion to inflict myself on the House hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 13, noes 72.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, messengers, and janitors to the following committees: Accounts—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Agriculture—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Appropriations—clerk $4,000 and $1,000 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,500, assistant clerks—one $1,900, one $1,800, janitor $1,000; Banking and Currency—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Census—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Coinage, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; District of Columbia—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress—clerk $2,000; Elections No. 1—clerk $2,000, janitor, $1,000; Elections No. 2—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Elections No. 3—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Enrolled Bills—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Flood Control—Clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Foreign Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Immigration and Naturalization—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Indian Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Industrial Arts and Expositions—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Insular Affairs—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Interstate and Foreign Commerce—clerk $2,500, additional clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Irrigation of Arid Lands—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Invalid Pensions—clerk $2,500, stenographer $2,190, assistant clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Judiciary—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Labor—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Library—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Merchant Marine and Fisheries—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Military Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Naval Affairs—clerk $2,400, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Patents—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Pensions—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Post Office and Post Roads—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,400, janitor $1,000; Printing—clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Public Lands—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200 janitor $720; Revision of the Laws—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rivers and Harbors—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Roads—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rules—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Territories—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; War Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Ways and Means—clerk $3,000, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,000, assistant clerk $1,900, janitors—one $1,000, one $720; in all, $168,970.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the expenses of the Senate under this item, on page 8. You will find under this item for the Senate, for its clerks, messengers, and janitors to committees, the sum of $427,880. The same item for the House is $168,970. The Senate has 96 Members, the House has 435. Yet the Senate, for the same services, expends 250 per cent more than the House expends. This, perhaps, is a finger pointing in the direction of the responsibility for the enormous growth of appropriations, and what may be termed extravagance in the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference minority: Clerk, $2,000; assistant clerk, $1,200; janitor, $1,000; in all, $4,200; the same to be appointed by the chairman of the conference minority.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 19, page 18, by striking out the figures "$2,000" and inserting "$2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 18, line 19, strike out the figures "$2,000" and insert "$2,500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is the clerk to the conference minority, really my clerk, who has been here as a clerk now for 12 years, and who at one time drew $2,500 as clerk to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and is one of the most valuable employees anywhere connected with the Capitol.

The clerks to the committees of great importance receive $2,500, and I think it is proper that this lady should be paid on a par with them. I know she more than earns the money, and I am afraid that I will lose her if her salary is not increased.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course I appreciate the force of what the gentleman has said with reference to the salary of this particular clerk. The matter was never brought to the attention of the committee. No suggestion was ever made to the committee as to this increase. When the bill was framed the committee supposed they were allowing a proper and sufficient salary for this particular clerk.

Mr. MANN. I take no exception, certainly, to the action of the committee. These salaries are fixed from year to year, and I would not have asked the committee itself to make any change. I trust it to the House. I personally, of course, will be satisfied with whatever the House does, and have a good deal of timidity in making the request.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that my only object in making the statement was simply to show why I was unable, on behalf of the committee, to accept his amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not question the value of this clerk, or the propriety of making the increase of salary, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois has said.

Mr. MANN. Of course everyone who has a clerk whom he has kept for a long time has a high idea of the value of that clerk, who otherwise would not be kept. I think I have the most valuable clerk around the Capitol.

Mr. RUCKER. I wish to say that for one, if it comes to a vote, I shall gladly vote to grant this increase. I am pleased to do it, because I have been wondering for a long time why the gentleman from Illinois was so much more efficient than some other Members, and now I believe it can be attributed to the efficiency of his clerk. [Laughter.] I will gladly vote for this increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I happen to know this clerk of my colleague [Mr. MANN]. When he was chairman of the important Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I had occasion to have some business with that committee, and I found, as he says, that this clerk was one of the most valuable of any of the clerks to committees. The clerk to the minority occupies an important place, and that clerk would be equally important to the minority whichever party was in power. A great deal of work has to be done by the minority leader, and while I might be more pleased if my colleague was not quite so active in all matters that come up in the House, yet I think he renders, in a nonpartisan way, a very valuable service to the House and to the country. So far as I am concerned individually, I believe the gentleman ought to have his way in reference to this matter. I think we should look at these matters in a nonpartisan spirit when it comes to employment.

There is another matter of the same kind which I would be glad to see done. I have done nothing except to say to the committee that I would be pleased to have it done. They have not done it, and I am not here to complain of that. For three terms of Congress I have been chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining. I, too, have a most valuable clerk of that committee, as good as any in the House; and while I would have liked to have an annual clerk, yet that committee has been given no assistance, except a clerk during the sessions of Congress. That committee has considerable business. While it does not report a great many bills, sometimes it performs a more valuable service to the House by not reporting some of the bills that come before it. I think this committee rendered some valuable service to the House and to the country this year by proposing to take up a lot of hard work itself rather than come to the House and ask for a commission to codify and revise the mining laws of this country, which has been asked for by the western section of our country and those who are specially interested in that work, and it should be done in the interest of the metal-mining industry. It involves a good deal of time and a good deal of hard work to keep track of all of these things, and I, for one, think that Members can best perform their duties to the House and to their country by having sufficient help to do the work. I believe these great committees should have sufficient assistance. I take it that the minority constitutes a great committee of this House, and it should have competent help. You can not get that competent help unless you pay reasonable compensation. I do not believe that the request of the gentleman from Illinois is unreasonable in this case.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am impressed with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has said. I think the subcommittee of the committee that reported the bill was impressed with the necessity of giving the committee over which he presides an annual clerk. He ought to have it, but it is not the province of this committee to create these positions. There is another committee of the House that reports to the House resolutions for the selection of the clerks for the various committees, and the Committee on Appropriations, as the gentleman from Illinois well knows, simply makes appropriation for the payment of their salaries. The Committee on Mines and Mining, over which the gentleman from Illinois so ably presides, is doing a great work, and that committee ought to have an annual clerk, and I think I am safe in saying that there will be absolutely no objection from the Committee on Appropriations to appropriating the salary for that annual clerk when the committee that has jurisdiction of creating these offices reports a resolution for us to adopt.

Now, in regard to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], we all know of his valuable services to this House. We know of the great work that must be performed by the clerks in his office. I did not know, and I doubt if other Members of the House knew, that the principal clerk who performs this work formerly received $2,500 a year, and is now receiving but $2,000. I am satisfied that if the estimate had been made for $2,500 there would have been no objection by a single member of the subcommittee that reported this bill. I am in favor of the amendment, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not interpose an objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I will be accused of standing on the floor of this House and voting to increase salaries. At least, that has never been my record heretofore. But I recognize the merit of this amendment, and I intend to give it my vote.

It is self-evident that the proposed beneficiary of this little increase is worth in every respect this sum, and it is self-evident that it will be returned in value to the people with manifold interest. I can see no reason why a clerk occupying that position should not be paid as much as any clerk of a committee. If I remember correctly, the clerk of the Committee on Accounts is paid $2,500. That is an important committee and a busy committee, but I dare say that the clerk to that committee does not have, and in the natural course of things can not have, one-fifth the amount of work which this clerk has to do. I hope that every Member on this side of the House will vote for this amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in regard to what was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], I simply want to emphasize what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has said. I believe that he is entitled to an annual clerk for the committee over which he presides. I do not think there is any member of the committee who did not think that he was so entitled, on account of the importance of the committee and the work it has to do; but the Appropriations Committee has always adopted the practice of leaving propositions of that kind to the committee which has jurisdiction of it—the Committee on Accounts. I feel quite sure that if the gentleman from Illinois will present the proposition to the Committee on Accounts, that that committee will report a resolution providing him with an annual clerk.

In regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] increasing the salary of the minority clerk from $2,000 to $2,500, as I said a moment ago, there was no suggestion made to the committee. We all appreciate the very able and very constant and distinguished service that is rendered by the gentleman from Illinois as leader of the minority. I believe that if the matter had been presented to the committee and the request made by the gentleman from Illinois the committee would not have hesitated to increase this clerk from $2,000 to $2,500. In view of his statement, in view of the importance of the work which must necessarily be done by this clerk, I do not question the value of the services she renders to the distinguished leader of the minority.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, feeling conscious that I can not imperil the motion pending before the committee, I want to inflict myself upon the committee for a moment. I am very glad indeed to see members of the great Appropriation Committee on both sides of the House inclined to be so generous and liberal in their expressions to-day. I am glad that when the suggestion is made that an efficient clerk is rated too low with one accord they say, "Put it up higher and we will agree to it." I am glad that when their attention is called to the fact that other committees ought to have better clerical assistance they are willing to give it. I want to give gentlemen, members of the Appropriation Committee, a chance to reflect and inform us why it is that some of the great bureaus of the departments of Government have received such harsh treatment at their hands. I know there was no willful attempt or purpose on the part of any Member, certainly no member of the Appropriation Committee, to do a wrong. And yet, Mr. Chairman, it seems that in an unguarded moment, when judgment had evidently gone off on a vacation, some one wrote into the bill provisions which I must characterize and denounce as wholly unjustified or unwarranted. At the proper time I shall ask to be heard again, and probably several times, hoping that gentlemen can be induced to come to terms, and they can make terms quickly if they will.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield long enough for me to say that the Borland amendment has no need of application in my office?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman has made a wholly unnecessary statement, perhaps the only unnecessary statement I ever heard him make. Since this has become rather personal, I want to say that I said a complimentary thing to the gentleman in the beginning of this debate, and I meant it. Since then I have heard on this side gentlemen speak of their lofty appreciation of the magnificent services rendered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that I recognize the wondrous, almost phenomenal services of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but I do not always appreciate them. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, surely the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is willing to grant long life and happiness to the gentleman from Illinois and to afford him the wish that he may continue to lead the minority?

Mr. RUCKER. Unquestionably; most heartily do I join in that wish. The fact of it is that as long as we have a minority party to be led, but I hope we will wipe it out next fall, I want the distinguished gentleman from Illinois to lead it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we will wipe out the minority upon this side next fall.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope so—wipe you all out, except the gentleman from Illinois and all of my other personal friends. [Laughter.] I notice that the Chair is just raising the gavel; I hope that is not intended as a menace to me, for I am not yet through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has yet one minute remaining of his five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that I am not talking about the Borland amendment. I am talking about something worse than that, and that is bad enough, if we may judge from the newspaper articles. I am talking about something that goes to the organization and efficient workings of one of the great bureaus of this great Government, and I am going to appeal as earnestly as I can to the membership of this House to be fair, and when gentlemen have done that which in their own judgment and upon their own consciences they think it fair, I will have nothing further to say about it.

I submit to the gentlemen, members of the Appropriations Committee, for reflection, that it is not fair to put a long legislative provision in this bill which applies solely to one bureau and to one alone, and that bureau the one which deals with more want and suffering than all the other bureaus of the Government combined. I refer to the Pension Bureau. I believe when the time comes and I am permitted to occupy the floor for a few minutes I can demonstrate to the House that a great injustice has been done that bureau, inadvertently done, I am sure, because I know these great men would not do an injustice intentionally.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment having been agreed to, the total, in line 20, will be increased from $4,200 to $4,700.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct all totals in the bill in accordance with any amendments that may be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct any totals necessitated by amendments being adopted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Semitic and Oriental Literature: Chief of division, $3,000; assistant, $1,500; junior messenger, $420; in all, $4,920.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We are now upon the item that relates to the Library of Congress. Lately I have seen a good many statements in the newspapers to the effect that wages of Government employees in the District were still paid upon the scale fixed 50 or 60 years ago. This implies, in the mind of any sensible person, that no promotions had occurred, no redistribution of work, no regrading of work, but that there was some kind of rigid, iron-clad classification that had been adhered to for 50 or 60 years. Almost every member of Congress who has given any attention to the matter knows that never an appropriation bill comes before the House that does not involve some increases of salary. On making out a good case for an increase of salary for a clerk or a class of clerks, the committee and the House has ratified that increase upon the recommendation of the heads of the departments. So that there has been a steady and continuous increase and promotion among the active force. It is true that the lower grades of employment are always filled up with new and inexperienced men, and therefore the grades of employment remain the same, but the personnel advances in accordance with age and experience and usefulness to the Government. What is true then in private employment is true in Government employment; that is, there is promotion open for the men in the service if they make good. I want to call the particular attention of the committee to page 3 of the report of this bill, by which it appears that in this particular item we are now considering 110 employees of the Government who have been promoted. These 110 employees of the Government are promoted by almost one provision of the bill. They are the employees that draw less than $960. There are 17 that draw from $720 to $780, 53 that draw from $780 to $840, 2 from $800 to $860, 4 from $860 to $920, and 34 from $900 to $960 each, so that here are 110 employees who have been promoted by one appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I desire to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that two years ago this same bill provided for an increase in the compensation of 100 or more employees in the Library drawing these small salaries.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and we are speaking now only of the employees of the Library of Congress, because that is the item that we are discussing. The same thing to which the chairman has referred occurred in other branches of the public service. The committee does act upon some sane principle in making these appropriation bills, in spite of the somewhat unbridled attacks that have been made recently in the newspapers. These young men that are in these particular employments are college graduates, who have come here for the purpose of learning the profession of librarian. They start in as inexperienced people at the very lowest rank, and we ought to keep a low grade for that purpose. We ought not to abolish the low grades. As soon as they become proficient they are advanced, and from time to time they go elsewhere into the State libraries, the libraries of universities, and the public libraries of all kinds throughout the United States, and thereby the advantage of their training in Washington is disseminated throughout the Union. That is a very sound principle upon which the committee acts. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman does not want to misstate the situation, and I am at a loss to know where he gets the information. Now, in the Library of Congress, among those persons to whom we are giving a $5 increase of salary, there are 38 assistants at $900. The youngest person in that division is 23 years of age; the oldest person is 69. I will give the gentleman the ages so he can see what he states does not tally with the facts.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the gentleman's objection to—the college-graduate statement?

Mr. GOOD. No. Some of them are college graduates. They come to the Library and become accustomed to this work; and many of them have been there performing this work for a number of years. It is true there are some promotions to libraries, but in the main these employees have been in the Library of Congress for a great many years, and a majority of them are over 35 years of age.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not want to make any criticism or imply any upon the action of previous Congresses or previous administrations or previous Appropriation Committees, but if these gentlemen are so old and have been there so long at these low salaries, why, it is time some Appropriation Committee ought to do them justice, and therefore I do not think the objection is well taken. We have done an act of justice to some employees who have been overlooked in the past by everybody. I believe in increases of salary for Government employees, and the point I make is simply this, that any general sweeping statement that salaries and positions have remained static in the District of Columbia for 50 years is on the face of it palpably absurd.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman. It is true that we have made a considerable number of increases of salaries, so far as the Library of Congress is concerned. It is not true generally that we have made any decided number of increases in the departmental service of the lower grade of clerks, especially those receiving $900, $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200. The conditions which are worthy of the attention of the committee are those prevailing in the lower grades. Instances were called to our attention many times that there were great numbers of resignations by clerks who had been in the service for a year or two drawing the initial salary of $900; that they had left one department and had taken employment with the Agricultural Department or the Interstate Commerce Commission, because there was no chance of promotion to the higher grades; that the higher grades were filled with old clerks—men in the service many years, drawing salaries of $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800. The only exception to that rule is the case of the Post Office Department. Some years ago Congress created what was known as an Efficiency Division in connection with the Civil Service Commission. It began its work in connection with the Treasurer's office and it made some radical recommendations there, which resulted in a great saving to the Government. It made a most thorough investigation in connection with the Post Office Department, established efficiency ratings, and this year, when the Postmaster General came before the committee with recommendations providing for promotions of clerks in all classes, from class 4 downward, the committee necessarily granted him every promotion, because we recognized the value of the work of this Efficiency Division.

As far as the other departments are concerned there was nothing before the committee so it could accurately determine whether the promotions were worthy of being recognized. Since the bill was first reported Congress, in the further deficiency appropriation bill, has created this Efficiency Division as a separate division, and we hope that that division will be permitted to go into the other departments and make its investigations, so that all the clerks may be placed on an efficiency rating, so when the heads of the departments come before the committee with a recommendation backed by the Efficiency Division we will have reliable data which we can follow, just as we followed in this bill the recommendations of the Post Office Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just one minute. But the committee did not feel it was warranted in making increases in the higher-grade officials such as chief clerks on recommendations that are so frequently advanced that because a chief clerk occupies the same designated title in other departments and receives a higher salary and who perhaps may have had incomparably more work, therefore we should raise the salary to conform to that. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. What the gentleman says, of course, is my own idea in many respects, but what I want to ask him is this question: The gentleman has given very painstaking study to the work of the committee; as the rules and the law now stand the head of a department can make promotions as fast as vacancies occur without any action of Congress, can he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; whenever vacancies occur.

Mr. BORLAND. And these promotions that occur in the bill which the gentleman helped to prepare is an additional line of promotion that has been established for these low-grade clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. For the Post Office Department?

Mr. BORLAND. I am speaking of this particular department—the Library of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as the Library of Congress is concerned, we adopted a wholesale recommendation for promotions. We realized that clerks receiving $900 a year and under connected with the Library of Congress, who, according to the testimony, had been in the service from 6 to 25 years, many of them married, the age of the youngest being 23, that it was not fair to have them paid at such a low salary, and so we increased those in the grades from $900 and under $5 per month in salary. We lifted them up, and I think no one can criticize that recommendation. But I do criticize the position of the gentleman from Missouri when he claims——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. That there has been sufficient promotion in the lower grades of the department service I deny.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman should not quote me as saying there has been sufficient promotion in the lower grades of the service. I said whenever it appeared to the committee there was necessity for promotion the committee acted on the suggestion, but whether they have acted to a sufficient extent or not I am not advised.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee was without reliable information. We do not have information similar to that furnished by the Efficiency Division as to the Post Office Department or as to the Treasurer's office, upon which we acted to the full limit. But we do recognize—at least I do—that there are numbers of instances of clerks entering the lower grades who are perforce obliged to resign from the Government service after they have become acquainted with the details of the department for a year or two because the upper grades are clogged and there is no chance for recognized ability. They go to the Agricultural Department, where they have lump-sum appropriations and where the clerks are promoted much faster. They go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the chances of promotion are much better.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. All of those $900 clerks can be promoted when there are vacancies above them?

Mr. STAFFORD. These vacancies occur upon resignation and upon death, and resignations from the Government service in the higher-paid grades are very few and deaths are very rare indeed.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not criticizing that at all; but I say I think it is right and I believe it is lawful for any department to advance from a lower to a higher grade when there are vacancies, and I believe that is the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, there are vacancies, but they do not occur sufficiently to retain the competent and efficient low-priced clerk who enters the service at $900 to $1,000 a year; and that condition should be corrected.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman if he thinks it is wise to write into the bill the legislative provision with reference to the Pension Bureau, that there shall be no promotion by appointment or promotion in any grade until there are four vacancies in that particular grade?

Mr. STAFFORD. When we come to the item relating to the Pension Bureau, I think every member of the committee will be prepared to defend the recommendation, because within the last two years, I will say to the gentleman very briefly, 16 men on the roll of the Pension Bureau have been permanently detailed to the office of the Secretary of the Interior. They have ample men and can call those men back at any time. The condition that has existed at the Pension Office we will call to the attention of the House in defense of our recommendation, and I am sure the House will support it, and I am sure we are in no way strangling the efficient service so far as the Pension Bureau is concerned.

Mr. RUCKER. The committee recommends a reduction of 68.

Mr. STAFFORD. On the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions we made the reduction of 68.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the hearings justify the position that they made a recommendation of 68.

Mr. RUCKER. Twenty is my understanding of it. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings, I think, will support my position; but I do not wish now to go into the consideration of this item. I wish to refer to the position taken by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], so far as the $900 and the $1,000 clerks of the department are concerned, and say that there has not been sufficient promotion to retain them in the Government service; but every one of the subcommittee expects that the Efficiency Division will begin its work in the other departments and come before us with the same kind of recommendation that the Postmaster General presented to us, so that we can make a scientific and well-considered promotion of all deserving clerks based upon efficiency.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think the action of the committee is wise, and I hope the House will not sustain it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think this matter was pretty thoroughly covered in the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], but there is a little matter of detail that I wish to submit, with regard to these increases. This bill increases the salary of 110 persons in the Library of Congress. The increase affects the salaries of all the clerks in the Library of Congress who receive salaries from $720 to $900 per annum. There are 57 positions where the salaries were from $720 to $780, and to give the committee an idea of what kind of work these persons are performing I want to state that one of these positions is filled by an assistant who has been in the Library of Congress for 40 years; 4 of these positions are filled by persons who have been there for 18 years; 7 for more than 10 years; and 18 for more than 5 years but less than 10 years. Twenty-three of the 57 assistants had previous library training or had been students in colleges. They were clerks of a very high order of intelligence, and deserve well the increase.

It was testified before the committee that a great many of the persons so employed receiving salaries of $720 to $900 were persons who were heads of families; some are widows with children depending upon them for support, or an aged mother or father depending upon the clerk for support. It occurred to the committee that inasmuch as these positions are filled by persons who are competent and well prepared to perform this service, they ought to receive more pay. I am not sure that we have given them the increase to which they are entitled, but we did give a $5-a-month increase for the 110 positions, and I am inclined to think that we are only doing partial justice to those persons whose salaries we have increased. We may not have done full justice to all.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. While we are discussing this general subject, I wish to submit some observations for the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the other Members of this body.

I think it an important matter for Congress to consider the question of a new, up-to-date reclassification of the clerical force of the Government. Not only should we do this in the interest of the public service and in justice to the clerks and the respective bureaus of the various departments, but a readjustment and increase of salaries, from the lowest to practically the highest, in the Government service.

My understanding is that there has not been a general increase in the salaries of the Government officials since 1854.

Mr. BORLAND. What was that statement—that there has not been a general increase in the salaries of the Government officials since 1854?

Mr. AUSTIN. No general increase in the salaries of Government officials since 1854. I read that statement in one of the daily Washington newspapers.

Mr. BORLAND. That ought, then, to be absolutely incontestable. Does the gentleman say that there have not been individual increases in the general appropriation bills?

Mr. AUSTIN. I said a general increase in the salaries of Government officials.

Mr. BORLAND. I never knew of a general increase, and neither does the gentleman know of such. There have been increases of all departments in separate bills.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; we will take, for example, the Library of Congress, and in this bill we carry an increase, and in the case of other bureaus of the Government, where the same argument would apply, we pass them over and do nothing; and then we will come here at the next session of Congress with another appropriation, with a favorable recommendation for an estimate from the head of a bureau recommending an increase for perhaps a limited number. We have had this partial and piecemeal method of increase here and there, and will have it in this Congress, and in the following Congresses, year after year. But we have never had in my recollection—and I entered the service of the Government 36 years ago as a clerk in the Post Office Department—a general and thorough investigation of this subject, bureau by bureau, with a view of eliminating inequalities, advancing and fixing and increasing salaries.

I remember the time, 36 years ago, when I was rendering clerical service in the Post Office Department and paid $45 a month, when a clerk on the other side of the desk, doing identically the same work, was paid $100 a month. And I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, there are many instances of that kind in the Government bureaus to-day.

Now, there has been a general advance in salaries in all private lines in this country.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at this time. There has been a general advance of salaries in railroad business and in private corporations of every kind and character.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to his colleague?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Under the law the clerks are divided into four classes—those receiving $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, I do not understand the gentleman to mean that there have been no promotions within those particular grades.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, no. The $1,200 clerk is getting to-day what the $1,200 clerk received 25 years ago. I ask this committee to consider this question: What has been the advance in the cost of living to the $1,200 clerk, comparing 25 years ago with to-day? Everything he consumes, everything he wears, and everything in connection with his living expenses has advanced, and $100, 25 years ago, Mr. Chairman, would go further than $150 would go to-day in meeting the actual expenses of life.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. My understanding was that the clerks, as a rule, were classified some years ago.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Does the gentleman say that there has been no increase of salary of any of those clerks since the classification was made?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have not said that.

Mr. CLINE. There has been no general increase?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I had a letter this morning from a clerk, who stated, without complaint as to her record, that she had had one promotion in 35 years; so I doubt not there are many clerks who have been drawing $900 and $1,200 and $1,400 a year whose cases are similar to her case. Where is the hope, the encouragement, and the justice when we turn our attention to the cases of these faithful and efficient public servants who for a half century have had no increase of salary or reward for a service which is higher and more efficient than the service of any private corporation in this country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] speaks of a reclassification of the departments in the Government. There are in this bill and there have been carried every year quite a number of increases of clerks from one class to another. The gentleman says that the committee should take some steps toward securing a reclassification and regrading of these clerks. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations three or four years ago, an Efficiency Division was created for the very purpose of establishing efficiency ratings in the departments and reorganizing and reclassifying the service and standardizing salaries according to services performed in order that clerks who perform the service may receive the compensation which should be paid them for work performed.

As a matter of fact, the Post Office Department has already been reorganized and reclassified, and efficiency ratings, established through the cooperation of that department with this Efficiency Division, have resulted not only in giving the clerks in that department a fair compensation for their service, but in giving them a compensation which the Postmaster General states is from 15 to 30 per cent more than would be paid for similar services in private employments. The committee on personnel in that department were instructed, when they came to establish these efficiency ratings to consider what was paid in private employment and in every case to bear in mind that the Government should be a model employer and to so classify or arrange the work and fix the rate of compensation as that from 15 to 30 per cent higher salary than is paid for the same service in private employment, not taking into consideration the fact that clerks here in Washington work for a less number of hours than clerks are required to work in private employment.

This Efficiency Division, under a provision carried in the deficiency bill, has been made a Bureau of Efficiency, separate and independent and apart from the Civil Service Commission. The head of it is appointed by the President of the United States, and it is expected that this Bureau of Efficiency will continue its work along this line and, just as rapidly as it can be done, will establish efficiency ratings in the other departments of the Government, so that there may be a fair working basis and a fair salary paid to clerks, having in view the actual amount of service performed by them.

It is impossible for any committee of Congress, as it is impossible for Congress itself, to undertake to establish efficiency ratings or to reclassify and reorganize the departments as the gentleman suggests. Congress has, acting on the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, provided a means whereby this work of reorganization and reclassification may be intelligently and properly done, with justice to everybody concerned. As I have stated, it has already been done successfully and fairly in the Post Office Department.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not here pleading for an efficiency commission. I am pleading for a readjustment and a reclassification and an increase of salaries. What has an efficiency commission to do with that proposition? It takes legislation on the part of Congress and an investigation and a report from one of its committees to bring about a reclassification, a readjustment, and an increase of salaries—not an efficiency commission that is without that authority.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman seems disposed to criticize the committee or to intimate that the committee possibly has not done what it should have done along that line. I want to ask the gentleman if he, as a Member of Congress, has introduced in this House a bill seeking to raise the salaries of clerks from what they were as established years ago?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman's question. It is the duty of standing committees of this House to report legislation in the interest of the public service, and no man who serves on those committees can shift the responsibility to a Member of this House who is not on the committees and has not the opportunity and the chance to bring it in. I am not criticizing the committee. I suggested to the Committee on Appropriations what I think ought to be done in justice to the clerks in the various departments of the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman is entirely familiar with the rules of the House. As a matter of fact, the Committee on Appropriations has absolutely no jurisdiction of legislation such as the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. AUSTIN. There must be committees of this House that can frame such legislation, recommend it, and report it to this House.

Mr. Chairman, the minimum wage in the Ford automobile factory at Detroit is $5 a day and the wages are from $5 to $10 a day. Here, in the conduct of the affairs of this Government, where we require the highest and most accurate service, clerks who have spent half a century in the service are drawing $1,200 and $1,400 a year. I think we have reached the time in this country where we ought to have a readjustment, a reclassification, and an increase of salaries for the clerks in every class, especially the laborers, the watchmen, and the messengers. Some of the people in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, who work standing on their feet all day long operating machines, are paid $1.75 a day, doing the most difficult and trying work, work which impairs their health. They receive less than $60 a month, yet we can not find a way to remedy this condition, which it seems will continue until time shall be no more.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, frequently I have stood on the floor of this House and urged Congress to give the farmers a rural-credit bill. Before the adjournment of last session I called upon the Democratic Party to meet the emergency for aid to the agricultural sections before that Congress adjourned.

One hundred years ago only 2 per cent of the people in this country lived in the cities, while at the present time over one-half of the people live in the cities. The people of the rural districts not being content with the opportunities to prosper on the farm have sought more inviting fields in the cities, where the opportunities seem greater to obtain a competency and accumulate property. We have reached the place in the history of this country when Congress must undertake to widen the field for more prosperous farm life. The rural-credit legislation should have been passed long ago.

Mr. Chairman, a rural-credit bill should not only include loans on farms, but provision should be made to make loans on personal security. The man who owns no land needs most a helping hand to aid him by giving him an opportunity to buy and pay for a home. There are thousands of honest men looking for a chance. Help him to buy a home and give him a chance to return the money by easy payments annually for 25 or 30 years at a low rate of interest. I grant that there would be some losses, but with proper management no great amount, and the Government can stand such losses. Furthermore, there will be enough profits to the Government to cover all the losses. The Government should extend its credit and financial aid to the rural-credit associations.

If the Government does not finance the rural-credit associations, the rural-credit legislation will not succeed, in my opinion. Some Members of this House are afraid of what is called "Government aid" to rural credit. There is nothing new and untried in this proposition to give the Government's credit—security or money—to farm-land associations, banks, or what you may please to call the institutions. The European countries have financed these institutions by different methods. If a farmer can get money on long-term loans at low interest, he makes permanent improvements with the money and lays the foundation for profitable farming. The borrower will be required to apply the money as directed by the rural-credit commissioners.

The Farmers' Union, through Hon. Charles S. Barrett, the president, a distinguished Georgian and able man, has presented a bill to Congress. I commend this bill for your consideration. I have introduced the bill, and it is now before the Committee on Currency. The committee has reported to the House the Moss bill, and it is quite likely this bill will be up for passage before the adjournment of this Congress. I do not think the Moss bill will meet the demands of the farmers. If it should become law, unless it is materially amended, the farmers will not organize associations and comply with the requirements in order to secure the money necessary for the successful operation of a rural-credit company.

The member of any rural-credit association must be entirely relieved of financial responsibility for losses of the association. There is not sufficient profit to the stockholders to induce the farmer with money to invest in and organize farm-loan associations and become responsible for losses of defaulting members. I have tried heretofore to provide amendments for rural-credit bills containing the stock and bond features, because I believe when a bill finally comes up for passage it will contain provisions authorizing rural-credit associations and provide for stock issue and sale of bonds, the bonds to be sold in the markets of the country, thereby procuring the money upon which the association shall operate. Therefore it behooves the friends of rural credit to undertake to amend the proposed bill so that it may be a success, if possible to make it a success. Nearly all legislation of importance contains compromises. There are 435 Members of the House, 96 Senators, and a President with veto power to be encountered when legislation is being shaped into law. The stock and bond rural-credit bill must be so amended as to require the Government to purchase the stock necessary to organize the association, provided the stock is not purchased by private individuals. The bill must be further amended requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to buy sufficient bonds to furnish the money necessary to finance the association at low rate of interest, provided the bonds are not purchased by individual purchasers. Members of the association must also be relieved of individual or collective liability for losses of the association.

I submit the following amendment:

PURCHASE OF BONDS BY GOVERNMENT.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon application of one or more of the rural-credit associations herein established, and upon the recommendation of the rural-credit board, purchase from the rural-credit association bonds not previously issued or sold, in an amount not to exceed $100,000,000 during any one year, and shall pay for the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Loans should be at low interest for 25 or 30 years and payments graded, the first few years less than the last years; as maturity draws near payments should be larger.

Another important amendment should be passed directing the rural-credit commissioners to provide rules and regulations for the rural-credit associations to make loans to persons not owning land. These amendments and others I urge Members to aid in passing should a bill without Government aid be called up for passage by the Currency Committee. I made a careful study of the bill reported favorably last session. I prepared a bill containing these suggestions for amendments should the bill come up. It is also important, in my opinion, not to give the Federal banking system any control whatever over the rural-credit banking system. Let the two institutions be separate and distinct.

Mr. Chairman, should the friends of rural-credit legislation with Government aid fail to get an acceptable bill reported from the committee favorably, then we should present a solid front and amend the bill presented for passage, as I have in part outlined. These amendments while not making the bill acceptable to the farmers would materially improve the bill and give Congress a nucleus upon which we could build, year by year, with necessary amendments. There are those who consider this legislation radical, but, Mr. Chairman, rural credit aided the struggling farmers of France, Germany, Denmark, and other European countries to farm with profit, and gave the farmers greater prosperity than they had ever known, while the Governments suffered no losses. I appeal to you to act now, on rural credit.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention of this House to a bill I have introduced amending the civil service. The bill provides for a new method of selecting officials from the eligible list of those who have successfully passed the required examination. According to the rules of civil service, examinations are held. These examinations are graded, and an eligible list is made from those successfully passing the examination. Then the list is furnished the Civil Service Commissioners in Washington and these three men, who know nothing of the applicants, select the official.

Mr. Chairman, I propose an amendment requiring the eligible list to be furnished the Member of Congress from the district where the official is to serve and place the responsibility of selection on the Member of Congress. He knows the character, nationality, and color of applicants, and he should have the power to select from the list and not have that authority lodged in a commission of three men in Washington. Furthermore, I have introduced a bill providing that when charges are filed against officers of the Government such charges shall be submitted to the Member of Congress representing the district of such officer. This would enable Members of Congress to remove undesirable officials in his district. All southern Members should actively support this measure.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of miscellaneous periodicals and newspapers, $5,000.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to make an observation on the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. I do not think he intended to create the impression that the House was adverse to raising the salaries of employees of the Government, but certainly such an interpretation might be given to what was said. I feel that every Member of the House is anxious to do right by the servants of the Government. One thing is true—that the magnitude of the employment necessarily requires some system by which the meritorious increases and promotions shall be made. I was particularly surprised to learn of the low wages paid in some departments of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where the very highest skill is required in some lines, especially in the detection of mistakes in the printing of bills and in operating machinery, where the attendants, known as helpers, who stand on their feet eight hours a day, receive but $1.75 a day. That is certainly a very inadequate wage, and I believe that Congress will be glad to welcome an opportunity, in a systematic way, to reach that question thoroughly and systematically and give the proper advance in wages. It is certain that the increase of wages in every department of industry in civil life has been made to meet increased expenditure, and the conditions make these increases in the compensation of Government employees necessary. It can not be otherwise in these departments, and I suggest that the Congress of the United States ought to be known to be the friend of the Government clerk. The fact that some of them do not get the wages that they ought to get should not be charged to the Members of this House. I believe everybody is willing to adjust these salaries and give the advances where they are deserved. Especially ought this to be true in such departments as the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where undoubtedly the most accurate work is necessary, and where, so far as I am able to determine, the very smallest wages are paid. I believe Congress is always ready to respond when a proper case for increases of wages is presented.

The Clerk read as follows:

Library Building and grounds: Superintendent, $3,000; clerks—1 $2,000, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400, 1 $1,000; property clerk, $900; messenger; assistant messenger; telephone-switchboard operator; assistant telephone-switchboard operator; captain of watch, $1,400; lieutenant of watch, $1,000; 16 watchmen, at $900 each; carpenter, painter, and foreman of laborers, at $900 each; 14 laborers, at $540 each; 2 attendants in ladies' room, at $480 each; 4 check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 58 charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—1 $1,200, 3 at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—1 $1,000, 1 $900; 2 wiremen, at $900 each; plumber, $900; 3 elevator conductors and 10 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $77,745.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to get some information. I notice, on page 27, Library Building and grounds, that there is a provision in line 11 for 58 charwomen, but there is no statement as to the amount they receive as compensation. Will the gentleman enlighten me as to their pay?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The last section of the bill provides for $240 per annum for charwomen, or $20 a month. They work about two hours every afternoon.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. They do not get a dollar a day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These women do not work more than a couple of hours—not exceeding three at the outside. They work there late in the afternoon or early in the morning before the regular work commences.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does that include the charwomen in the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This particular provision does not; but that is the sum paid all charwomen.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Do they all get the same wage?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do; all that are carried in this bill.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The reason I ask is that I was informed that they cleaned about 15 offices a day and did not get a dollar a day, and I wanted to know whether that was true. I wanted to know how many offices they cleaned and what they got.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The wages paid the charwomen in the House Office Building are carried in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. The gentleman does not know how much labor they give for the compensation received?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not; but their labor is under the control of the commission which has control of the House Office Building. That commission consists of the Speaker, the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITZGERALD, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I asked the question because I think that the poor unfortunates that do this grade of work are neglected in the matter of compensation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the matter of charwomen there comes up rather an important proposition. Charwomen, in the main, are employed two or three hours late in the afternoon, so that they can get through in time to go home for dinner; but if the hours of service for the clerks shall be extended one hour and the clerks work until 5.30 in the afternoon instead of 4.30, it is going to be a very serious matter affecting the charwomen. A charwoman now begins work in the offices about 5 o'clock, and if they do not commence work until 6 o'clock they ought to be paid a higher compensation, because it is much more of a hardship on them and much more difficult to work at that time of the evening rather than the time when they now work.

Mr. RUCKER. Is the gentleman addressing his remarks to the charwomen in the House Office Building?

Mr. MANN. I am addressing my remarks to the gentleman from Missouri, for whom I have a high regard.

Mr. RUCKER. Since the gentleman has addressed his remarks to me, I am sure he will permit me to ask him a question or to put in the form of a declaration. The charwomen in the House Office Building do perform services late in the evening. That presupposes that they must hold themselves in readiness to go to work at the late hour of 4 or 5 o'clock. Not only that, but I think the gentleman will agree with me that it has been decreed by somebody—and the most of these are white women—that they must get down on their knees to do the scrubbing.

Mr. MANN. That was decreed by nature; in order to scrub a floor you have to get down on your knees. We did not do that.

Mr. RUCKER. I am against nature, then. I want to say that, in my judgment—and I submit it in all kindness—that no white woman ought to be required to get down on her knees and scrub a pathway for you and me to walk over. I will not resign if they stand up erect and scrub it like we do our homes.

Mr. MANN. I can remember seeing my mother scrub the floor in that way. I do not know whether the gentleman's mother ever did it, but I think likely.

Mr. RUCKER. Our mothers did worse scrubbing than scrubbing the floor when they scrubbed you and me. [Laughter.] But I do not like to see women who have nurtured children get down on their knees to scrub floors.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOTANIC GARDEN.

For superintendent, $1,800.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 6, page 28, by striking out the figures "$1,800" and inserting the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 6, strike out the figures "$1,800" and insert the figures "$2,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is an awful small salary for the Government of the United States to pay the superintendent of the Botanical Gardens. He does not get half the pay that is given for performing like services in any of the large cities of this country. He certainly renders valuable service in the preparation of shrubs and diversified labor in the way of building up the flower industry and advice and information that he gives. It semes to me the salary ought to be $2,500.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the committee has recommended quite a number of increases of salary in this bill, but the committee felt that it should first consider those who draw the smallest salary. For that reason the committee did not undertake to increase the salaries of those who are drawing these higher amounts. The superintendent is a very clever man, and I like him very much, but I am compelled to make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this is an increase not authorized by law, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Bureau of Efficiency, authorized by the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved February 28, 1916, to establish and maintain a system of efficiency ratings, to investigate administrative needs of the service relating to personnel in the several executive departments and independent establishments, required by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts for the fiscal year 1913 and 1914, respectively, and to investigate duplication of statistical and other work and methods of business in the various branches of the Government service; for purchase or exchange of equipment, supplies, stationery, books and periodicals, printing and binding, traveling expenses not exceeding $100, and street car fare not exceeding $50; in all, $40,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, at the beginning of line 16, insert the following: "Twenty-eight."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is simply to fill in the date when the urgent deficiency appropriation act was approved. The act had not been approved when this bill was prepared and sent to the printer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the authorization for this appropriation was carried in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. The urgent deficiency appropriation bill was not discussed very much, and I do not recall that much explanation was made of what the Bureau of Efficiency was to do as a new bureau and why it was taken out of the control of the Civil Service Commission. What does this Bureau of Efficiency do, what are its functions, and how is it going to operate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can make the duties of this Bureau of Efficiency any clearer than they are set forth in the paragraph. I possibly might be able to explain better what this bureau is to do by stating some of the things that have been accomplished by this Bureau of Efficiency when it was acting as a division of efficiency within the Civil Service Commission. For the past year the division of efficiency has been in the Post Office Department undertaking to establish a rating of efficiency for the clerks in that department, and by reason of the work performed by this Bureau of Efficiency the entire Post Office Department has been reorganized, with the result, as the Postmaster General states, that there has been a more equitable arrangement of salaries and of the work done by the various clerks in that department.

Mr. MANN. I feel quite confident that if the gentleman is correct in his statement—and I do not doubt the correctness of it—that if this item had been in the Post Office appropriation bill it would have been stricken out by an overwhelming majority. If the result of this bureau is reorganization of the Post Office Department, about which I have expressed no opinion, either on the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill or otherwise, it certainly would not have received the rabid approval of Members of the House upon either side of the House, for apparently there was considerable criticism of what the Post Office Department was now doing and the way it was doing it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that criticism arose possibly from objections made to the action of the Post Office Department with reference to what might be called its field service. Of course this reorganization to which I refer applies alone to the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I understand, and that is what the gentlemen here said—that the reorganization of the Rural Delivery Service and all that was done by the department here in Washington was wholly without any consultation with those in the country. Is there any substantial decrease in the expense of the Post Office Department as carried in this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A decided decrease. This reorganization has resulted in a reduction of 37 employees in this particular bill and a total reduction of expenses in that department of $42,650.

Mr. MANN. Is not that all in the matter of money-order accounts and things of that kind where they are putting in tabulating machines, or practically so?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure it is not all in that office. Some of it no doubt is.

Mr. MANN. The Bureau of Efficiency has had nothing to do with that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Postmaster General stated that the entire reorganization of that department had been made or was made with the aid and cooperation of this efficiency division. As a matter of fact, this division has been in the department for a year, or even more, and has worked upon establishing efficiency ratings and reorganizing the service in the department, and as a result not only this particular reduction has been made, but they cut about 81 employees out of the last bill, making a total saving of $118,295, without in any way impairing the efficiency of the department. On the contrary, it is more efficient now in every respect, so the Postmaster General states, than it has ever been.

Mr. MANN. If they have been able to do that and reduce the number of clerks in the department by some system, in what does the reduction consist? What is the change in this department which this bureau has inaugurated? Do they make the clerks do more work, or do they provide for clerks doing less work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No additional work is required of any of the clerks. They are not required to work any longer hours in the day, but the reduction has been made through improving the methods of business in the department.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be very interesting if the gentleman would be able to give one instance where there has been a change in the method, just one example. A few years ago it was customary if an example was called for in the Interior Department to say, "Well, we have quit copying in longhand every letter that we write." I do not know whether that had been done for years; I guess not; but that is what they always said when anybody was asked for some evidence of change of methods, which would result in efficiency—they had quit copying letters in longhand. Can the gentleman give us one for information?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can give the gentleman no specific illustration except to say that there has been a better system put in. The work of the department has been simplified so as to enable the work to be done with a less number of clerks. The committee naturally was more interested in the net results so far as the number of clerks and expenses were concerned, than it was in ascertaining exactly what the present system is.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is sometimes pretty hard to tell. We carried in the Post Office bill the other day a provision in relation to letters sent to the Dead Letter Office which probably will result in a material decrease in the number of clerks in the Dead Letter Office, and next year when they explain the Bureau of Efficiency will say, "See how we have reorganized it; we have let out a certain number of clerks," and the committee will not have any information to the contrary when they report the bill, and the Bureau of Efficiency will not have any more to do with it than the man in the moon has.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that perhaps the most notable change that was made by the Division of Efficiency was in the accounting department in the office of the Treasurer. The accounting department had instituted a system of card indexes by which items that went through the Treasurer's office were placed on cards and as a result of that work after about six months Mr. Burke, the Treasurer, found that his work was running behind every day. He had all of the clerks Congress had made provision for in his office and in addition to that he had about 56 additional clerks detailed from different offices and still he was running behind with his work. He did not know what to do, and they called in the Division of Efficiency and inside of six months those clerks who were detailed there had been sent back to the bureaus from which they had been detailed and the work was current, and the work of this Efficiency Division resulted in a net saving to the Government of $101,000 a year.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the Bureau of Efficiency will be able to perform the work it ought to perform, and there certainly is a big field for the work of the bureau, if the officers of the Government maintain the same opposition to this bureau that they maintained toward the Bureau of Efficiency when it was part of the Civil Service Commission. This gentleman who was in charge of this bureau appeared before the committee and was interrogated as to why the division did not continue the work in other divisions and other departments, and here is his testimony:

Mr. BROWN. By the inauguration of modern methods for handling the work of the accounting division of the office. We have not covered the entire Treasurer's office. In fact, we wanted very much to cover the whole Treasury Department, but the officials of the department made it impossible for us to do so. They refused us access to the office.

Mr. STAFFORD. You only got as far as the Treasurer's office?

Mr. BROWN. We only finished the Accounting Division of the Treasurer's office.

Mr. STAFFORD. From your acquaintance with the work in the Treasury Department, how long would it have taken your committee to have finished the work in the Treasury Department?

Mr. BROWN. It would have taken us a year or so. We have only a small force.

Mr. STAFFORD. You say that you were prevented from entering the office?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; we could not make any satisfactory arrangement. We tried.

Mr. STAFFORD. You tried with whom?

Mr. BROWN. The Treasury officials, the Secretary and the Assistants, all concerned.

Mr. BYRNS. When was that?

Mr. BROWN. Just recently.

Mr. BYRNS. And they refused you permission to continue the work?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, it is a peculiar thing that this man who with his little force could go into the accounting division of the Treasury and in the short space of from three to six months install there new methods which would save the Government in that department alone $101,000 a year, and yet the Treasury officials closed the door on this man who has been doing this most excellent service. I think one reason why this bureau is established is that Congress wants to give some backbone to this institution, and that if we created a regular bureau no official in any department could say to him, "You can not come into this office and install efficiency methods." I believe that it was the intention of Congress in taking it away from the Civil Service Commission, which had practically refused to give this division the power it ought to have and which it will have under the present law, to establish a real efficiency bureau.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and in the time allotted to me I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] a question. He can use up my time in answering it. I was much interested in the appropriation here for the Bureau of Efficiency, because it looked to me as though we might at last begin the work of reorganization in the District of Columbia and start a work about which there has been so much talk, finding out what these employees get and what is a just compensation to be given to them, and I have been enlightened by the gentleman's remarks as to the difficulties encountered by that bureau, and I am at a loss just now to know what the bureau is, and under what department it operates, and its personnel.

Mr. GOOD. I believe the bureau is intended to be very closely connected with the executive department of the Government. Obviously it should be under either the executive or legislative branch of the Government. The chief of this bureau will be appointed by the President, and I believe that the intention of Congress was to give to the President an arm that he could reach out into the various departments of the Government and there promote efficiency methods, equalize salaries, and be informed exactly what was going on in the various departments of the Government, and to have this information at first hand.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask the gentleman further; of course I know that this provides for the establishment of a bureau. Under what authority was this investigation made in the Treasury Department? Under the bureau as it existed and was organized before?

Mr. GOOD. Prior to this act, approved February 28, 1916, there existed in the Civil Service Commission a division of efficiency, and I think that arrangement was not entirely satisfactory. The head of the efficiency division desired to do certain work in some of the departments, but I think the commission did not in all respects approve of what the division of efficiency was doing in some of the departments.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Now, can the gentleman tell me what the prospective personnel of this bureau is to be—how many are to compose it, who will be the chief, what will be the salaries, respectively? In this paragraph is a lump appropriation for $40,000 providing that no man shall receive more than $4,000 a year. The information I am after is to find out the personnel of the men and how many there will be.

Mr. GOOD. That rests, I think, largely with the President.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. That is, the number who shall be appointed?

Mr. GOOD. There is to be a chief of this bureau, a head of the bureau, but the number of employees is fixed by law. It simply creates a new bureau of efficiency without specifying the personnel of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Lest there should be misunderstanding as to the real work of this Efficiency Division, I wish to direct attention for a few moments as to what it has done and what it is planning to do. In the Post Office Department, where the Postmaster General solicited the active cooperation of this division, it has been engaged in grading salaries attached to the various characters of work performed. Those salaries are 15 to 30 per cent above the salaries paid in commercial walks of life. After the salary is determined according to the work performed, the grade of work, then they determine the normal amount of work that should be done by a clerk filling that position. This division has framed certain schedules to be filled out by the heads of the respective divisions in the Post Office Department as to the amount of work the individual clerk performs, as to whether he is up to the standard or not, being a certain standard of work attached to each respective position. If he is up to the standard, he gets the salary that attaches to his position; if he is not up to the standard, he is reduced accordingly.

The criticism throughout the departments is that you have a low-priced clerk at $900 or $1,000 performing work at a maximum of efficiency, and beside him you will have another clerk, at $1,400 or $1,600, who is soldiering. It is not an incentive to the low-priced, efficient clerk, working at the maximum, when he finds a high-priced clerk doing almost nothing at all or only half work. Mr. Brown, who testified before the committee, summarized in brief just what is expected to be done by this Efficiency Division. I read his testimony, as found on page 85 of the hearings, as follows:

> We first determine the proper salary for the work to which he is assigned, and then the rating gives us a report on the quality of work he does and the quantity of work he does, whether he is up to the normal or whether he is below the normal, and then from that we determine mathematically what salary he should receive.

As inaugurated in the Post Office Department it is proposed to have semiannual ratings of clerks to see whether they are up to the normal, and then, at the end of the fiscal year, the department head or division head will make his recommendations to the superior officer, and that superior officer will have his recommendations embodied in his estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be submitted to the committee, as they did this year, and we will approve them if we consider them proper, as we did this year—his entire recommendation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. COX. What result will this economy commission have in the last analysis toward recommending an increase or decrease in salary?

Mr. STAFFORD. They determine the salary that should be paid for the work for which the clerk is employed. They standardize that work, and they fix the salary at 15 to 30 per cent above what is paid in commercial establishments. And they determine whether that clerk is performing the work that should be performed in that respective grade. If he is, he gets that salary. If he is performing a superior quality of work, at the end of the year he is recommended for promotion, based upon the quality of work, so that the men hereafter are to be paid according to the quality of the work in the position to which they are assigned.

Mr. COX. I believe that there are five men in this commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are more. There is the head of the commission, Mr. Brown, and then his assistant and a number of clerks. And this year we intend to increase the clerical force, because we vote a $10,000 increase, making it $40,000 instead of $30,000 as heretofore.

Mr. COX. What peculiar qualifications have the members of this commission? Have they had experience in private life?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. Mr. Brown has long been engaged in responsible work connected with the departments in many particulars. He was employed by the Committee on Appropriations some years back when they were investigating as to the premiums paid by insurance companies for bonding the Government employees and private contractors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Every Member here is fully acquainted with the work that is being done by so-called appraisal companies and public accountants toward standardizing work and introducing modern business methods. To-day there is not a large business establishment that has not within a decade or so had their entire system of accounting revised so as to know exactly to a fraction what it costs to perform the respective work in their respective departments. In the Treasury Department this Efficiency Division has installed modern business methods, has introduced mechanical devices that have saved clerical assistance. It is installing the same character of mechanical devices in the Post Office Department, saving thousands upon thousands of dollars, and though the commission has only been in existence three years, it can point to-day to a saving to the Government of more than $950,000 in value to the Government, whereas the total amount expended for this Efficiency Division has been less than $100,000.

So that from this very brief statement the committee can see that they are doing wondrous work toward equalization of salaries, toward the standardization of work, and toward the inauguration of modern business methods in the departments. If anybody goes down to any of these departments he will be amazed at the old, obsolete methods that are in vogue and the lack of modern business methods prevailing in the departments. When you have an up-to-date man appointed in charge of a division, immediately there is a reformation and there is a great saving in clerical force by reason of the inauguration of these modern business methods. The purpose of this division is primarily to bring to the departments the methods that are prevailing throughout the commercial world. If they have made that great saving in a short time and established a system in the Post Office Department by which the clerks will be paid what is their due according to the work performed, then certainly it is work to be approved of. Congress has established them as an independent bureau, so that they will not be hamstrung by any executive head who is not in sympathy with their policy, so that they may have the right now to go right into the departments and reorganize them, with a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars which we expect they will save on the showing which they have made in the past.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I know so little about efficiency in departmental work that I am not prepared to controvert any statements made by the gentleman who has just addressed the committee. It seems that somebody discovered an efficiency commission, and that efficiency commission or committee admits that it has gone to some places where it has been permitted entrance and there rubbed its Aladdin's lamp and produced marvelous changes in the short time of its existence. [Laughter.] It is asserted that this commission has saved $900,000—nearly $1,000,000—already, and the Lord only knows how much it will save when it gets in full sway. The only way by which we can form any conception on earth of its wondrous achievements is to ask the gentleman whose name has been called, Mr. Brown, get his opinion of himself as the head of the efficiency commission, and accept what he says of his splendid accomplishments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it looks to me like a sort of preposterous proposition—a contradiction—that a man whom we provide by law shall not possess qualifications of greater value than $4,000 per annum should be sent to a Cabinet officer and say, "I want to come in and tell you people how to run your business." That is what it means. Lord! What a misfortune that somebody away back yonder, about the time we were discovering this country, did not discover an efficiency commission! Why, it would have saved us billions and billions of dollars during the administration of a certain political party which recently went out of power. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any better way to get efficiency than to get an honest man at the helm—a qualified man—and then allow that man to attend to the business intrusted to him, without being annoyed by some commission roving around the departments, with modern improved business methods concealed about his person, to advise and direct trusted officials how to run their business and how to discharge their duties.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman speaks of millions that might have been saved under a former administration.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; and it might have been saved if you never had been in power, but since you were in power it would have been lucky for us if we had had an efficiency commission, I guess.

Mr. GOOD. When we were in power it was not necessary to have an efficiency bureau, because the officials then seemed to know how to transact the public business. But now we find conditions different, as, for example, in the Treasurer's office, when Mr. Burke had been in office six months, when he had all the clerks we had provided, and had 56 clerks detailed to his office, yet had been unable to strike a balance for 90 days, and the nearest he came to striking a balance in that department was something like $5,000,000.

We had to do something. We virtually turned his office over to receivers, to tell him how to run it. We did not want to call them "receivers." We wanted to let him down easy, and we simply called it a "Bureau of Efficiency." That Bureau of Efficiency went in there and showed him how to run his office, and Mr. Brown's testimony and Mr. Burke's testimony is that by those methods, those improved methods, they have saved $101,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman made a very able explanation which I did not understand. I still stand on the one proposition that it is simply absurd to select men for responsible positions, $12,000 places, places at $6,500, $5,000, and $4,500, and then go around with a dark lantern and find some man at not more than $4,000, who by accepting admits that he is not worth more than $4,000, because under the law he is limited to that amount, and empower him to tell all men in official life how to transact business. I think it is absurd.

I do not mean to say that the gentlemen who framed this bill are not wise, but I think the principal argument upon which they have predicated their action was the admission of the efficiency commission that it was efficient, which I think is exceedingly doubtful.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], but from a different standpoint.

There has not been a word, I suppose, in the English language that in the last five years has been abused more than the word "efficiency." The word "service" went through a period of abuse for a number of years, and now it is the word "efficiency." Whenever it is necessary to establish a new bureau or department it is done under the excuse of "efficiency."

Now, it seems to me, from some little experience that I have had in the State of Illinois, that this Bureau of Efficiency may result in becoming and may become, as a matter of fact, a great engine of oppression for civil-service employees. As I understand it, this bureau is to be appointed by the Executive power, the President of the United States. In Illinois in every department of the State Government there is appointed an efficiency bureau by the governor. Three or four years ago every man was under the civil service in the Government of the State of Illinois. What has been the result? Through the operation of an efficiency board every civil-service man in Illinois has been deprived of his position, and to-day his position is filled by "efficient" members of the Democratic Party.

Take it, for instance, in the city of Chicago as an illustration, in the office where they inspect grain, for example. I know personally of several cases there where it was desired to get a certain man out, and the efficiency board was called upon by the superintendent to mark that man "B" or "C." For instance, I know of one case where a new man was brought in in the place of another gentleman. The man who brought him said, "I want to introduce you to Mr. O'Brien. Mr. O'Brien is efficient. Mark him from now as A1. See? Take it from me; A1."

So, sooner or later, this very thing that you gentlemen on the other side are now constructing may in its time come back to curse you.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. With pleasure.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman assumes that this particular provision is intended to create a new bureau. As a matter of fact, this Division of Efficiency has existed for several years, and this particular Bureau of Efficiency has absolutely no authority to do more than to make investigations and make recommendations to the heads of the departments, who, after all, are given the discretion as to whether or not they will adopt the recommendations.

Mr. KING. Are there not some markings or some bases upon which this Efficiency Bureau acts?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Efficiency Bureau undertakes to establish a rate of efficiency and to standardize the salaries.

Mr. KING. In standardizing the salaries of different employees it is necessary, is it not, to have some basis upon which to operate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The basis upon which this Division of Efficiency has operated in the past, as in the case of the Post Office Department, has been to go on the outside and ascertain what salaries are being paid for similar services in private employment and then, as was done in the Post Office Department, to add 15 to 30 per cent over and above those salaries for the clerks in the department.

Mr. KING. If two men are working in the same department, how does the Efficiency Bureau get at the standard of one and the standard of the other with reference to raising or lowering the salaries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By simply putting its employees in that office and giving attention to the amount of work performed and which can be performed by those clerks. One great injustice that has existed in the departments has arisen from the fact that sometimes there are two clerks at the same desk, performing the same amount and quality of service, one drawing, say, $1,200 and another $1,800. Now, this Division of Efficiency seeks to equalize these matters and to put all clerks on a fair basis——

Mr. KING. In other words, it is a method of espionage, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no; not at all. That does not enter into it at all, because this Division of Efficiency goes into the office under the direction and with the consent of the head of the department and makes a fair, open, and careful investigation before undertaking to establish what a clerk can reasonably do within certain hours.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been some misunderstanding about this Division of Efficiency. In the first place, the Division of Efficiency is responsible directly to the President of the United States, who appoints it. Not only that, the recommendation of the Division of Efficiency will be adopted only when the department voluntarily adopts its recommendations as to methods and as to the classification of clerks; and if the department does not do that, there is but one way in which it can be done under the law, and that is by an Executive order of the President of the United States. Somebody has asked, "Why is it that the heads of the departments can not do this themselves?" First, they will always tell you that the enormous duties devolving upon them are such that they can not take the time from their desks, nor can the chief clerks take the time from their desks. A chief clerk performs duties for which he receives a salary, and he can not go through the entire department, which would perhaps take him six months or a year, without neglecting the duties of his office. In addition to that, this division has absolutely no particular interest in any clerk, has perhaps no acquaintance with any clerk, and it is the function of this division to recommend modern business methods.

When Mr. Taft was President he called attention to the unbusinesslike manner in which the Government service was being performed. He called attention to the fact that many of the methods were archaic, that the departments had adopted practically none of the modern machines; and he recommended the appointment of a commission, which is now known as the Cleveland Commission. The trouble with that commission was that it was rather topheavy, and the recommendations which it made were more enormously expensive than were the old methods. Even under Mr. Taft's administration that commission fell down. I call attention to the fact that it was done in Mr. Taft's administration.

All the administrations that have given any thought to this matter have realized that many of the methods of doing business in the departments are as old as the Government. Every well-managed business concern in the United States, according to the testimony in the hearings for several years, employs men of this very character to go through its entire system of bookkeeping, to go through its entire system of manufacturing, to go through the entire wage scale, and then these efficiency experts make recommendations to the board of directors, and the board of directors then have the parties before them and adopt that which they think important and that will advance their business. Every great business institution adopts a method like this before undertaking to make radical changes. Your Committee on Appropriations, which recommends to this House the expenditures in every department of the Government, is absolutely at a loss to know what to do until it can get some perfectly impartial statement about the manner in which a department is run. You can never get a chief clerk, who has been one of the clerks in a department for a long time and finally has risen to be chief clerk of that department, to criticize the work of his own hands. That is human nature. I am not blaming the clerks, I am not blaming the chief clerks; I am simply blaming the system for which Congress is responsible. Whatever is done must be done gradually and it ought to be done carefully. If you will read the hearings in reference to the work done by this efficiency commission, in the testimony of the Postmaster General, in the testimony from the Office of the Treasurer, in the testimony from the Office of the Collector of Customs, you will find that in every case where they have adopted the methods suggested by the commission they have done no clerk an injustice, but they have adopted the system of not filling vacancies when clerks die or resign or when the departments need them elsewhere. No man loses his job unless he falls below the third grade of efficiency as provided by law. That is in the interest of good administration, and that has been the law for a long time, that where clerks do not come up to a certain degree of efficiency they may be reduced to a lower grade, and to a grade below that, and if they do not come up to the lowest grade of efficiency it is the duty of the head of the department under the law to drop such employees.

Now, the sole purpose of this commission is to work in harmony and cooperation with the head of the department, with the bureau chief into whose department it goes. All the recommendations are made to the heads of the departments, and if they are not willing to adopt a recommendation, it can only be put in force by the President, under whose direction this efficiency board works. Being the head of the executive department of the Government, it is his duty, if he is convinced that it will be for good administration, to require the Cabinet officer to adopt these methods. I believe that for the first time in many years there was an effort made in Mr. Taft's administration to go through the departments and do as a great business man would do endeavoring to improve the methods of his business. I believe that if this board be continued, with the powers that they have had, they will be able to accomplish a great deal of good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether the most important suggestion made by the Taft Commission during its entire existence was not the use of the so-called window envelopes instead of other envelopes?

Mr. SISSON. I would not say that. My purpose in referring——

Mr. MANN. They could not get anybody to adopt them, because it was discovered that it was more expensive to use the window envelopes——

Mr. SISSON. That is true, he made that statement originally——

Mr. MANN. Notwithstanding the report of the efficiency board which was without investigation or knowledge, that was the most important thing they ever did.

Mr. SISSON. I think the so-called Cleveland Commission broke down. I did not go into the details, but what I wanted to impress upon the committee was that Mr. Taft's administration pursued methods that were archaic and old, and had not adopted modern business methods. But there was this done during the Taft administration, that in many departments they adopted modern business methods, installing many labor-saving machines. The installation of those machines is going on now as rapidly as the department can take them on.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. BENNET. What did the Cleveland Commission cost the Government?

Mr. SISSON. I am not able to tell the gentleman, but it was a considerable item of expense.

Mr. BENNET. Three or four hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. SISSON. I think it was something like that, but if the gentleman wants the sum I will put it in the RECORD. Now, this efficiency board is on an entirely different idea and different principle. It goes into the department with the permission and cooperation of the head of the department, sent there by the President, and they work along in connection with the particular chief of the bureau, or the particular chief clerk, going entirely through the department, and where they find a duplication of service they eliminate that, and where they find that by consolidation of a little division where for the purposes of administration in the past they were divided into two classes they bring those two classes together, thereby eliminating from the department useless clerks by having them do a greater amount of work by the new methods. If by installation of some labor-saving machines, as soon as you can get the clerks skilled enough to operate the machines, then they can eliminate the more expensive labor with the human hand by adopting the machines.

This work will go on. Business concerns now in the great business world every year have some outside company to audit their books. They get some outside man and hire him to go through, because frequently a suggestion coming from some one outside of the business results in a great deal of good.

There has been a mass of testimony taken the last few years, beginning in the Taft administration, on this subject, and it has convinced your committee, not only by the testimony but by the work done in the last few years, that this efficiency board is doing a great deal of magnificent work for the Government. Mr. Peters, who was formerly a Member of this House, has eliminated from his office fifty-odd clerks, and it was done at the suggestion of this commission. What has been said about the Treasury Department is equally true, except that I do not agree in the conclusions that my friend reached, that it was due to any incompetency on the part of the present Treasurer of the United States; but it is true that they have eliminated something over 100 clerks within the last 18 months. If you ask me, Is the work of the clerks thorough? I say it is; and not a clerk lost his job permanently. They are detailed to other departments where it is not necessary to call on the Civil Service Commission to certify any more new names. They retain them in the service by this process, and you gradually consolidate the department, getting efficient service and efficient results. You do no clerk an injustice in this method of administration, for the reason that you will transfer him. But in the other method it would be difficult to administer it, for the reason that you will cause some man to lose his job—and you know that it is a crime to separate a man from a purely Federal Government job.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that there can be much doubt in the mind of any Member as to the advisability of the adoption of this efficiency system. It is a well-known fact that in nearly every business concern this system has been adopted, and where they have not, in many cases, it is due to their inability to get efficient experts to put it into operation. I know of my own personal knowledge of the great advantage and benefit of this type of efficiency. I can say that during the first two or three years of the present Democratic administration that if it had not been for the fact of our ability to get smarter men than we were to show us we would not have been able to have found any profit at all in our business.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman speaks of better men than he. Has not this particular line of business become a highly specialized industry in which men have trained themselves, and that it takes experts of the highest class?

Mr. SNYDER. It needs experts of a high class in that particular line of work. It is to-day difficult to find enough men of this type to supply the demand in different manufacturing business concerns in the country. It is a fact that conditions in this country to-day, and they have been for the past two or three years, are such, with everything going up, that it has been difficult with the ordinary force in any factory to be able to figure out the cost system fine enough to determine whether they had a profit or not. The result has been that concerns have employed some one to come in the factory and give them information they did not have, not always believing that it would turn out a better system than they were working on; but I know in my own case and in my neighbors' that the system has proved a complete success and has been the means of not only reducing the number of employees in the different parts of the business but it has been the means of bringing out efficiency in many employees who did not know that it was in them. As has been well said by the gentleman on the other side, two men working side by side doing the same work, and one would do twice as much as the other, and yet both drawing the same pay, which is unfair. This efficiency system straightens all that situation out. I sincerely hope that this section will be adopted, because I believe it will serve to make a great saving of money.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the amendment is exhausted. The pro forma amendments will be withdrawn, without objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expert examiners: For employment of expert examiners not in the Federal service to prepare questions and rate papers in examinations on special subjects for which examiners within the service are not available, $2,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have some member of the committee explain how the appropriation, beginning on line 11 and ending on line 14, page 31, is expended?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean the expert examiners?

Mr. COX. Yes. I see that a lump-sum appropriation is made. Is that paid out as a salary, or per diem, or how?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman means the expert examiners?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is paid for expert services. Frequently in some of these very technical examinations that have to be held in order to fill technical and scientific positions in the Government it is necessary for the Civil Service Commission to secure the services of special scientific men who have particular knowledge of the subject about which the examination is held. In so far as that particular character of work is concerned, there is not enough of it to warrant the employment regularly of anyone for a particular length of time.

Mr. COX. There is no monthly or yearly pay roll provided for out of this lump sum?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it is an appropriation which is simply used whenever it is necessary.

Mr. COX. Who fixes the amount to be paid to these experts?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Civil Service Commission.

Mr. COX. It is really a per diem payment, is it?

Mr. SISSON. It is piecework.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, and including not exceeding $1,000 for expenses of attendance at meetings of public officials when specifically directed by the commission, $18,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the occasion for increasing this appropriation by 50 per cent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this increase was allowed on account of the fact that the Civil Service Commission had stated that the amount heretofore appropriated was by no means sufficient to pay the actual traveling expenses. It seems that their expenses have increased largely on account of the examinations which have to be held to fill vacancies in the fourth-class post offices.

Mr. MANN. Did any member of the committee in the hearings publicly or privately ascertain how much anybody in this commission had expended for traveling expenses to the California Exposition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No statement was made to the committee as to any such expenses, nor was the committee advised of any.

Mr. MANN. How many officers connected with the commission found it necessary last summer to attend to business in California or on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was no statement of that kind made to the committee, nor was any member of the committee advised that any member of the commission had been to the California coast.

Mr. MANN. Two members of the commission went in the fiscal year before the last.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If they went to the coast and their expenses were paid out of this appropriation, I assume that they went upon official business.

Mr. MANN. Oh, of course they went upon official business. Wherever any Government employee goes, if he has sufficient influence with the head of his department or bureau, he goes on official business, at Government expense, though his real business is private business. If it were known how much had been expended for some Government officials to go out to the exposition, it would cause a wave of wonder to run over the country.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was in error in my statement a while ago to the gentleman as to nothing having been said in reference to this particular visit to the coast. On page 77 of the hearings this statement was made by the commissioners in explanation of that:

The commissioners this year went to the Pacific coast and looked into the Reclamation Service, the navy yard, and various other services. We can not administer our work properly unless we get close to it. Now, all of that costs a considerable amount of money, and that is what we want this increase in the travel appropriation for. We are only asking now in the regular appropriation for an increase of $8,000 a year, and, as we have to look after 300,000 people, it seems to me that is a modest estimate.

The committee allowed only $6,000, and they were induced to do that, in view of the fact that a deficiency was submitted to Congress recently asking for $6,000 to provide traveling expenses for the remainder of the current year. That amount was allowed, and the committee felt that since $18,000 had been allowed for this year, possibly, in view of the increased work and the increased necessity for traveling, the same amount should be given for the next year.

Mr. MANN. As I understand that statement, it is that the reason for the increase is caused in part because the commission found it necessary to visit the California Exposition at Government expense, and to assign as the reason for that visit there that they wanted to look into the reclamation projects and the navy yards, and so forth. Everyone knows that it is not the duty of the Civil Service Commission to know all about all the branches of the governmental service. They never will know it, and it is impossible for them to know it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. They now want $6,000 more for traveling expenses. It may be that they need some of it; I do not know. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, how close is the nearest reclamation project to where the exposition was held, if the gentleman from Illinois can tell us?

Mr. MANN. I do not remember. I remember this, that a distinguished committee of the House visited the reclamation projects last summer and found it also convenient to pass through San Francisco and visit the exposition, and, I think, very properly so.

I have no criticism of these gentlemen for visiting the exposition, if they are called out there. I think they would be foolish if they did not visit it when they went there, as so many branches of the Government did. That, however, is not the question; it is the tendency everywhere in the governmental service that if they can have a nice pleasure trip and call it official business at Government expense they will take the opportunity. It is not confined to one administration; it is not a partisan matter at all. Some clerk wants to have a nice trip. He finds that it is essential that he should make an investigation out on the Pacific coast. He will not know any more about the matter when he gets back than he did when he started out, and the real truth concerning such a case will be ascertained by the people who are on the coast and have charge of it. I have examined the travel account of various departments as they are shown in the reports. Some of the departments honestly give information; some of them do not. Whether that is an intentional matter not to give information I do not know. It may be a lack of information on their part. Some of the departments give the information, but they all, so far as my observation goes, abuse the privilege of traveling at Government expense.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in much that he had to say as to the tendency of many of the employees of the Government to use Government funds for traveling purposes such as those to which he has referred. In so far as this particular appropriation is concerned the Civil Service Commission asked the committee to allow $20,000, stating that it was $10,000 short of what they really ought to have for travel purposes. For several years they have been allowed $12,000 for that purpose, but for the past two years they have come to Congress and secured a deficiency appropriation. Year before last they were allowed $6,000 as an additional appropriation and this year they asked and received $8,000 as a deficiency appropriation. In each instance Congress has granted these deficiencies and increased their appropriation to $18,000 and $20,000 a year. Your committee felt that under the circumstances, it appearing that the Civil Service Commission had been unable to keep within the limits of the appropriation of $12,000 for the past two years, and knowing that there was an increase of work, an increase necessitating travel on account of the addition of fourth-class offices and other matters to their former duties, decided to recommend to the House that it appropriate for this item $18,000, hoping that during the next year there would be no necessity of the Civil Service Commission coming before Congress and asking for another deficiency appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words only to add a word to the justification for the committee recommending $18,000. This item is not for the purpose of providing that the commissioners themselves shall travel, but the increase was made to provide for examiners to go around the country in the respective districts and see whether Federal employees in the civil service were infringing at all the civil-service regulations as to political activities and the like. It is only fair to say to the committee, in view of the criticism which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes, that the commissioners did recommend the repeal of the provision of the urgent deficiency act which limited their expenditures per diem to $5. They believe that they, as presidential appointees, should be relieved of the restriction, so that when they travel about the country they would have no limit on the amount of their expenditures. The committee did not approve of that. The committee did not believe there was any urgent need why they should not be limited to $5 a day, like every other official connected with the departments; and the committee also believed that they should not be encouraged to travel about the country when the service would not be benefited by their leaving their headquarters here, and therefore we refused to grant the recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For Secretary of State, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; Counselor for the department, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $3,500; officers to aid in important drafting work—4 at $4,500 each, 4 at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; assistant solicitors of the department, to be appointed by the Secretary—3 at $3,000 each; chief clerk, who shall sign such official papers and documents as the Secretary may direct, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; law clerk and assistant, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary, to edit the laws of Congress and perform such other duties as may be required of them, at $2,500 and $1,500, respectively; chiefs of bureaus—2 at $2,250 each, 5 at $2,100 each; 2 translators, at $2,100 each; additional to Chief of Bureau of Accounts as disbursing clerk, $200; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; clerks—17 of class 4, 19 of class 3, 25 of class 2, 43 of class 1 (3 of whom shall be telegraph operators), 18 at $1,000 each, 18 at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 6 messengers; 23 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $420; packer, $720; 4 laborers, at $600 each; telephone-switchboard operator; assistant telephone-switchboard operator; driver, $840; hostler, $720; in all, $321,020.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It may be entirely correct—I do not undertake to say—in reference to the counselor's office of the State Department, to carry the same language year after year, "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." That indicates that the counselor is to be appointed. Of course, he is not to be appointed but he has been appointed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The only explanation that can be given in regard to that is that it is not a statutory office, but is provided for each year in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For that reason I infer it is necessary to carry it each year in the same language.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, of course, if the present Counselor should resign or be displaced without some such provision in there, his successor would not have to be confirmed by the Senate. I understand that; but it makes it rather awkward to carry a provision as though, after the consent of the Senate should be obtained, he was to be appointed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that, as he has called this matter to the attention of the committee and the House, that possibly next year the matter may be drawn in some other way. Of course, a new provision would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is subject to the point of order; but I am not making the point of order. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Comptroller of the Currency: Comptroller, $5,000; deputy comptrollers—1 $3,500, 1 $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; chiefs of divisions—1 $2,500; 2 at $2,200 each; general bookkeeper, $2,000; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000; clerks—11 of class 4 (one transferred from Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants), additional to bond clerk $200, 16 of class 3, 19 of class 2, 26 of class 1, 13 at $1,000 each, 7 at $900 each; stenographer, $1,600; 6 counters, at $840 each; messenger; 5 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; two messenger boys, at $360 each; in all, $161,380.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is a word misspelled there in the first line, and I ask that it be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following employees in the Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from July 1, 1916, to December 31, 1916, both dates inclusive: Clerks—2 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 1 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 1 $900; 2 counters, at $900 each; in all, $6,050.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the purpose of this appropriation, bottom of page 46 and top of page 47. It seems that these are special employees from the 1st of July, 1916, to the 31st of December, 1916.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These are the employees who are to perform the extra work required on account of the emergency-revenue measure.

Mr. COX. The war-revenue measure?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The war-revenue measure. The gentleman will remember that law expires by limitation on December 31 of this year, and therefore this provision is only made for the first six months of the ensuing fiscal year, or during the operation of that law.

Mr. COX. This provision, as I read it, extends the time from June 30, 1916, to December 31, 1916—six months?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. When this law was extended recently by Congress provision was made for the clerks up until the end of the present fiscal year. Now, this bill applies to the next fiscal year, but limits the employment of these clerks for the first six months.

Mr. COX. It takes care of them for the first six months of the next fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing: Director, $6,000; assistant director, $3,500; chief of division of assignments and reviews, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; disbursing agent, $2,400; medical and sanitary officer, $2,000; stenographer, $1,800; storekeeper, $1,600; assistant storekeeper, $1,000; clerk in charge of purchases and supplies, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 9 of class 2, 9 of class 1, 8 at $1,000 each, 12 at $900 each, 15 at $840 each, 3 at $780 each; 9 attendants, at $600 each; helpers—1 at $900, 2 at $720 each, 2 at $600 each; 3 messengers; 7 assistant messengers; captain of guards, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of guards, at $900 each; 60 guards, at $720 each; 2 forewomen of charwomen, at $540 each; 25 day charwomen, at $400 each; 77 morning and evening charwomen, at $300 each; foreman of laborers, $900; 4 laborers; 85 laborers, at $540 each; in all $240,860; and no other fund appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for services, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of the character specified in this paragraph, except in cases of emergency arising after the passage of this act, and then only on the written approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in every such case of emergency a detailed statement of the expenditures on account thereof shall be reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] reserves a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just make it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the words in lines 12 and 13, "captain of guards" and "two lieutenants of guards."

Mr. COX. And "60 guards" also.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; "60 guards," in line 13.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Do you make it on the word "guards," in lines 12 and 13?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. It appears in three places.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The word "guards," which occurs once in line 12 and twice in line 13?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee on behalf of the committee: "Page 48, lines 12 and 13, insert the word 'watch' instead of the word 'guards' in line 12 and where it first occurs in line 13, and the word 'watchmen' instead of the word 'guards' where that last occurs in line 13."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to make it conform to the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, in line 13, after the words "sixty guards," which have been changed, I believe, to read "sixty watchmen," I move to insert the figures "$840" in lieu of the figures "$720."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know, Mr. Chairman. It may be subject to a point of order, but I trust the gentleman will not make it. I think these watchmen are entitled to receive as much as the watchmen around the other places, and I understand some of the other watchmen do get $840. If that is true, those around the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, it seems to me, ought to receive as much as the others.

Mr. GOOD. I will state to the gentleman that this is a statutory salary and the watchmen as a rule receive this salary.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand there are some exceptions, and I thought they ought to put them all on the same salary. If they do the same service they ought to draw the same salary as a matter of justice and fairness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Is the salary of the current law $720 for these watchmen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Seven hundred and twenty dollars, and it is so fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, then. Under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill approved July 16, 1914, the salaries of these watchmen were fixed at $720 per annum. The amendment increases that amount, and there is no authorization of law for it. So the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Surgeon General of Public Health Service: Surgeon General, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,250; private secretary to the Surgeon General, $1,800; assistant editor, $1,800; clerks—4 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 8 of class 2, 1 of whom shall be translator, 9 of class 1, 5 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; telephone operator, $720; 2 laborers, at $540 each; in all, $61,550.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the item at the top of page 50, on line 2. There are four clerks of class 3 in the old law. Here there are five. I find four new offices added here in this paragraph. What does the Chair rule upon that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, unless the gentleman has something further to say.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Clerk read the item, so as to show us how to identify it in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report that part of the item that has been indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 2, at the end of the line, "5 of class 3."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I find it is "four" in the old law instead of "five."

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I simply wanted to raise the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It has been universally held that under section 169 of the Revised Statutes it is in order to increase the number in any given class of clerks to be employed in any of the departments in Washington. This provision in the bill simply increases the number of clerks of that class in one of the departments in Washington, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $1,900; exchange teller, $1,800; vault clerk, $1,800; clerks—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,400 each; 3 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; messenger, $840; 3 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $31,500.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee why it is that appropriations continue to be made for these subtreasuries since we have established the Federal reserve bank act, which provides that all public moneys shall be deposited in those banks. What do the subtreasuries do now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These subtreasuries are places of deposit for our coin, and they also do the business of cashing checks and handling checks drawn on the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the Federal reserve banks for?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, the latter service is performed by the national depositories also. The Treasury officials have been giving some attention to the question of whether or not the duties of these subtreasuries can be transferred or devolved upon the Federal reserve banks, at least to a certain extent. But the gentleman is no doubt aware of the fact that in order to do this it would be necessary to pass some legislation and make provision for some of the duties now performed by the subtreasuries. While most of the members of the committee are in accord with the idea of the gentleman from Illinois, that there might be an elimination of much, if not all, of the work done by these independent treasuries, we were unwilling to arbitrarily cut off all the appropriations until there had been some consideration given to the question of what particular agency was to perform the service now performed by them and proper legislation passed in order to make it possible to transfer the duties.

Now, the gentleman will find in this bill, on page 62, a provision which the committee has recommended, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress at the beginning of the next session which, if any, of the subtreasuries shall be continued after the end of the fiscal year 1917, and if, in his opinion, any should be continued, the full reason for such continuance; or if any should be discontinued, what legislation will be necessary in order to transfer their funds or functions to the Federal reserve banks. The committee recommended that provision, so that at the next session of Congress we might possibly be able to devise some means whereby some of these independent treasuries may be eliminated.

Mr. MADDEN. I congratulate the committee on having taken up the question with a view to eliminating these subtreasuries, because I think, now that the Federal reserve act has been passed, the Federal reserve banks throughout the country can do all the work that these subtreasuries are doing, without carrying the expense that is incurred by the continuance of the subtreasuries.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the entire subcommittee agrees with the gentleman fully, but I will add that we felt a delicacy in cutting out all of these subtreasuries unless we were assured that the facilities were ample and the Federal reserve banks were in a position to take over this entire fund and perform the entire service now performed by the subtreasuries.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman that it should be done in a regular way, and I congratulate the committee in having taken these initial steps to abolish the subtreasuries.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is generally conceded that some of these subtreasuries could be immediately abolished without doing any harm to the governmental service, particularly that at Baltimore, where the work could be taken over by the Treasury here at Washington.

We gave special attention to this proposition and called before us the committee of the Treasury Department on the subtreasuries. It was surprising that they had no definite program to recommend this year seeking the elimination of these useless branches, and the committee on its own initiative incorporated in the bill a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to report at the next session of Congress, so that we would have a definitive program looking to the elimination of some of these useless offices.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. SLOAN. I will ask the gentleman why he makes this assault on Baltimore now, at this particular time, after it has lost every plank in its platform? [Laughter.] Why should he now suggest the taking away of its subtreasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course Baltimore has been very harshly treated by the Federal Reserve Board, and I did not join very cheerfully in the proposition to eliminate the Subtreasury at Baltimore, in view of its loss of the Federal reserve bank, which was located at Richmond. There is at present, as the gentleman knows, a movement on foot to correct that inequality and to restore the Federal reserve bank to Baltimore rather than have it located at Richmond, which, in the opinion of many, and particularly in the opinion of those hailing from Maryland and the business district thereabouts, is not the proper financial center. We do not wish to join in an undue assault upon the privileges of Baltimore at the present time. She has suffered tremendously at the hands of the Federal Reserve Board so far as passing out political persimmons is concerned; but everyone of the subcommittee sincerely hopes that the Treasury Department will take this direction to heart and come before the committee with a well-defined program. We could, without any harm whatsoever to the service, have eliminated one or two of these subtreasuries. It is true that the Federal reserve banking act is in the preliminary stages of development, and that some time should be given for the evolution of that banking system before it undertakes the work that is now performed by the subtreasuries. But the showing made to the subcommittee by this special committee demonstrates positively that there is no need whatsoever for many of these subtreasuries. There is need for the Subtreasury at New York, even with the growth of the Federal reserve banking system, but not for many of the others. We hope that next year the Treasury Department will bring in some well-defined program that we can follow without doing any injury to the banking and financial institutions of the country in general.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of form I will oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] for the purpose of obtaining the floor.

I do not think the criticism of my friend from Wisconsin is altogether a just one with reference to the treatment of Baltimore, because in the location of these Federal reserve banks the banks which desired to become members of the association were permitted to vote upon the location of the Federal reserve banks in the subdivisions of the country where they decided to locate the reserve banks. So when the board met and canvassed these votes, they located the reserve banks in the cities where the greatest amount of stock voted to locate the banks.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Was that the case in the location of all of them?

Mr. SISSON. That was the rule that was adopted, and my information is, without ever having seen the figures, that that was exactly what happened. In the district in which Mississippi is located there were two cities which were very active for the location of the reserve bank. Those were New Orleans and Memphis. I would have liked very much to see the reserve bank located at Memphis. It is a great distance to Atlanta, but the Atlanta banks are great hustlers, and they got a great deal of stock subscribed; and so, when it came to selecting the city, Atlanta got the votes.

Mr. FESS. Did the banks of New Jersey vote for Philadelphia to be the Federal reserve city for their district?

Mr. SISSON. It is possible that the banks of New Jersey might have voted for New York; but when your district is laid out, then you vote your first and second choice of places in that district.

Mr. FESS. There was a change in that district, and I wondered why the change was made.

Mr. SISSON. It is possible, although I do not know anything about it, that portions of New Jersey being just as close to Philadelphia as other portions are to New York some of them would perhaps prefer to continue with Philadelphia. These districts were tentatively formed before the vote was taken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I only want to say that geographical as well as financial considerations entered into that question.

Mr. SISSON. Of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There were some banks over toward New York which probably preferred to be in the New York district because of convenience.

Mr. SISSON. As I understand, they made an estimate of the bank capital within a certain area, and after having made the estimate within a certain geographical area, then they permitted those within that area to vote as to the location. I suppose in the estimate of the amount of capital in the national banks and other banks that desired to enter the association of New York, where they had ample banking capital, that the New Jersey banks were included within that territory.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman understand that the banks were informed as to what these districts included?

Mr. SISSON. My understanding is that there was no absolute, defined, and fixed district until after the bank stock had been subscribed; they had only outlined tentative districts, and if within the territory a sufficient amount of banking capital was secured under the act to make any of these Federal reserve banks, they located the bank in accordance with the vote of a majority of the stock so subscribed.

Mr. SLOAN. I wanted to know whether they outlined these tentative districts and gave them to the banks before they voted.

Mr. SISSON. I think that was absolutely necessary or they could not have voted intelligently.

Mr. SLOAN. I was wondering how they located the two reserve banks in Missouri.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Baltimore was unfortunate in not having sufficient stock within her territory to get the bank, and Richmond secured it, but the bankers determined it for themselves.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the last say rests with the Federal Reserve Board as to the location of the Federal bank, and even now there is a proposal pending before the board to change the location of the bank from Richmond to Baltimore.

Mr. SISSON. I think the board has it absolutely within its power to do that, but I do not believe they would do it without consulting the bank.

The Clerk read as follows:

New Orleans, office of assistant treasurer: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; paying teller, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; vault clerk, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,200; clerks—1 $1,500, 5 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; messenger, $600; in all, $25,290.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning with line 4 and ending with line 10, inclusive, on page 60.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, the act establishing the Federal Reserve System made unnecessary nearly all the subtreasuries. Whether there is any necessity of keeping any of them I think is most doubtful, and yet here they are carrying in this bill, as they were in the last bill, large appropriations for men and officers who are doing work which is unnecessary and might just as well be done by the Federal reserve banks, which are all fully organized and have men and clerks not fully employed. If this amendment be adopted, I shall follow it with a motion to strike out others.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does the gentleman single out the subtreasury at New Orleans?

Mr. PLATT. I will say to the gentleman that I might have taken any other one, or all at once. I have no desire to discriminate against the subtreasury at New Orleans. I think that if any city deserves one, having been treated as it was by the committee that organized the Federal reserve districts, it is the city of New Orleans.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that we should be charitably inclined to New Orleans and Baltimore which were slighted by the Federal Reserve Board in the location of Federal reserve regional banks? Does not the gentleman think that we should defer elimination of all of these substreasuries until the Secretary of the Treasury brings in the report next year? The subcommittee thought that they were useless appendages under our existing financial system, that they are providing large salaries for persons who have held the offices for years and years, and most of them with little work to do. I quite agree that New Orleans makes a poor showing. On January 22 of this year there were only $691.35 customs receipts deposited in the Subtreasury at New Orleans. The next smallest amount was that of the Subtreasury at St. Louis, with $1,038.13, and the next was Baltimore, with $3,779.31.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the gentleman reading from—the customs receipts?

Mr. STAFFORD. The day's customs receipts on the date named.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At the ports named?

Mr. STAFFORD. At the ports I have just named.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to hear that the customs receipts at the port of New Orleans were so small, when the bill carries an appropriation for a subtreasury at that place of $22,290. The gentleman knows that when once an office is established, with some one drawing a salary, it is a mighty difficult proposition for the party in power to abolish the office. In case the Democrats are in power, it separates a deserving Democrat from a job.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the clerks have been reading very hard to-day, and I rise to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman withhold that and allow us to dispose of this matter of the subtreasuries?

Mr. MADDEN. This one.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am somewhat at a loss to know why the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] should have reserved his fire for the subtreasury at New Orleans. We have passed all of the others without an objection on the part of the gentleman from New York or anyone else to their inclusion in the bill. Now he selects a subtreasury on the extreme southern border, which is farther away from any Federal reserve bank than any other subtreasury in the United States. In the city of St. Louis we have a Federal reserve bank and a subtreasury. In the city of Baltimore there is a subtreasury, not so far removed from a Federal reserve bank. I quite agree with the gentleman that there may be good reasons for eliminating some, if not all, of these subtreasuries, except of course, the one at New York and possibly the one on the western coast, but it certainly would be unwise to undertake to do that now, especially since it will be necessary, if it is done, to pass legislation to devolve the duties now being performed by those subtreasuries upon the Federal reserve banks or other Government agencies. As a matter of fact, if all of these subtreasuries were discontinued now, it would be necessary for Congress to make some provision to store all of the money that is stored in all of these subtreasuries, because the vaults of the Government at Washington are not sufficient to take care of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we should adopt the motion of the gentleman to strike out the New Orleans Subtreasury at this time, and then follow it up by striking out all that follows, we would leave standing the Subtreasuries at Baltimore, at Boston, at Chicago, and Cincinnati, which would not be stricken out, while we would strike out those at New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco, and leave ourselves suspended between heaven and earth.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and therefore I think, if the gentleman from New York proposes to make the motion to strike out any of them, the matter ought to have been taken up when the question was first brought up, so that the committee might have had some discretion as to which ones could best be discontinued.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there not a provision in this bill subsequently, on page 62, for a report by the Secretary of the Treasury as to the propriety of continuing the subtreasuries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is quite true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that paragraph should be adopted, this whole question will come up during the course of the next year, and we will have it at the next session of Congress, so that it can be acted upon intelligently?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. In other words, the Secretary of the Treasury will report at the beginning of the next session, if that paragraph remains in the bill, what, if any, of these subtreasuries may be discontinued, and if any are to be discontinued then he will suggest the necessary legislation to take care of the business now being performed by such subtreasuries as are discontinued. I hope that the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that I have no desire to be unfair to New Orleans. I selected this site simply at random.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I acquit the gentleman of any such intention, but I think the gentleman does see that if we undertook now, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania just suggested, to abolish New Orleans and then followed it up with the others——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if we did that the gentleman from New York would be under the painful necessity of striking out New York, and of course he would not undertake to do that.

Mr. PLATT. I am not quite sure I would not undertake to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Therefore the gentleman from New York ought to withdraw his motion in order that the House might adjourn in peace.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman fear if I do not withdraw the motion it will be carried?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I venture to suggest that after having a hard day's toil the reading clerks ought to be given a rest. This has been one of the hardest days we have had, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was in hopes, since we were moving along so smoothly and in such good humor, that we might get along farther, but I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12207, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUGHES, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. MCDERMOTT, indefinitely, on account of serious illness of his mother.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short statement by my colleague [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. FOSTER. What is it about, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. PLATT. It is on the question which is now being discussed in regard to submarines.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we ought to have that now and I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. PLATT. It does not involve anything serious; it is something that was published in the newspapers on Friday, February 25.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we ought to have any newspaper remarks inserted in the RECORD now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman withhold for a moment? I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Baltimore Sun on the question of the parcel post—a very short editorial.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, March 3, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1916.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee in the midst of conditions calling for our deepest thought and our nearest approach into Thy presence. We come amid our limitations because of the unknown and unmeasured forces of our human life. We have our history in the past as our guide, but human life has not exhausted its resources in that which it has accomplished in the past. Thy commandment brings us into a larger brotherhood than any constitution, and Thy kingdom covers all the nations of the earth.

Look Thou upon us this day as we face the responsibilities of our age. Let Thy blessing rest upon these men whom Thou hast called into places of responsibility and power. Grant that Thy will may be done, and that we may learn how to establish righteousness and justice among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, February 25, 1916, when, on request of Mr. STONE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

[Telegram.]

MILFORD, N. H., February 26, 1916.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

By authority of executive council of New Hampshire Bankers' Association and indorsed personally by prominent bankers all over the State, I hereby heartily approve the Gard amendment pertaining to interlocking directors as introduced in the Senate by Senator KERN and referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. Please use your best endeavors to push this worthy act to speedy and successful passage.

FREDERICK W. SAWYER,
President New Hampshire Bankers' Association.

Mr. HUGHES presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Jersey, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a memorial, in the form of a resolution, passed at the woman's meeting at the statehouse, Topeka, Kans., February 3, 1916, favoring the adoption of a resolution to provide for the immediate submission of the equal-suffrage question to the legislatures of the various States. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution passed at women's meeting at the statehouse, Topeka, Kans., February 23, 1916.

Whereas the political freedom of the women of this country is a vital question that demands immediate attention; and

Whereas we, as women who already possess the franchise, regard it as our first duty to use our political power to gain this right for other women: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, women voters of the State of Kansas, urge upon Congress the necessity of submitting the suffrage amendment immediately to the legislatures of the various States, in order that this measure of justice may soon be a part of our National Constitution.

The above resolution was passed at a meeting of 100 women held February 23 at the statehouse, Topeka, Kans.

LETTA DAY MONROE,
Chairman of Meeting.

TOPEKA, KANS., February 24, 1916.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to certain widows and orphans of veterans of the Civil War, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ashland, Kans., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wichita, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of the name of any church, religious denomination, society, or association for purposes of trade and commerce, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Montana, praying for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Flathead reclamation project, which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Branch, Journeyman Barbers' International Union of America, of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Council of Vallejo, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to permit vessels outside of the jurisdiction of the United States to engage in the coastwise trade, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Gabriel, Cal., praying that an appropriation of $300,000 be made for the improvement of the Yosemite National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Alameda, Cal., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Linden, Cal., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented a petition of the members of the Holy Name Society, of St. Stephens Church, of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Bank of New York, of New York City, N. Y., praying that the United States assume responsibility for land grant and improvement bonds of the Philippine Islands, which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. McCUMBER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Battleview, N. Dak., remonstrating against a tax on gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the North Dakota Dairymen's Association, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the cold storage of dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to warn American people to stay off armed merchant ships, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented memorials of sundry citizens of Elba, Cushing, and Farwell, all in the State of Nebraska, remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the congregation of the Hanover Congregational Church, of Sprague, and a petition of sundry citizens of Stamford, Conn., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have received a great many telegrams from people in my State bearing upon our relations to the European conflict and upon the attitude of our Government regarding the exportation of munitions of war.

I had intended to have this telegram, from Charles A. Houser, F. A. Pulte, and others, which I hold in my hand read. I should like very much to read it and to say a word about it if opportunity is to be afforded me for that purpose. Clearly under the rules of the Senate in the presentation of petitions and memorials I can not claim this right if objection is made.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I feel constrained to call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present the following protest from citizens of Michigan, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PITTMAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

He also presented a petition of the Dauphin County Medical Society, of Pennsylvania, praying for an increase in the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE. I present the petition of Charles Edward Ertz, of New York City, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. The joint resolution which accompanies the petition need not be printed; it can be referred, together with the petition, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution and petition were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

120 LIBERTY STREET,
New York, March 1, 1916.

To the honorable the SENATORS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: Herewith the writer begs to submit the outlines of a joint resolution for the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and earnestly requests that it be adopted.

Having been in Europe from the outbreak of the war until a few weeks ago, the writer finds it impossible to believe that the Members of the Congress of his own, his native, land can be so callous to every sense of both honor and shame as to allow Americans to be murdered upon the high sea—or, in fact, anywhere else—with impunity, and he appeals to Congress to at least adopt the inclosed resolution.

The writer begs to remind Congress that the 117 Americans murdered on the Lusitania are still dead; their ghosts, like Cæsar's, "walk unrevenged among us."

A firm stand for our rights as a nation is not likely to "plunge us into war," because none of the nations now at war could afford to go to war with us; but if it did bring us into this war, it would place us where we ought to go to stop the bloody career of the man who has already caused the untimely death of millions of the best and bravest and noblest of his neighboring countries and his own. The man who without the slightest cause was in the saddle with his sword out before his kindly father was cold in death, the man who has planned for war and world conquest ever since.

Are we of this country going to sit smug and complacent indefinitely, like a nation of poltroons, cowards, and moneygrubbers, while others of our race and our civilization are being slaughtered to feed the greed of an inhuman monster? Have we of America no duty to perform, no call to give actual assistance in aid of those who are laying down their lives for right and justice? Unprepared are we? So were England and France and Russia unprepared—to their terrible, their dreadful cost. So was ancient Carthage unprepared, and her rich, self-satisfied, and comfortable money-making people could not be induced to prepare. Why should they be "plunged into war"? They had nothing against Rome. They would "remain neutral," and refused to spend the smallest sum for preparedness. What was the result? Rome came over and literally wiped them out of existence. History, as we all know, repeats itself. Like circumstances and like causes produce like results.

Arise Americans! Let us gird on our armor and stand up for the right. Eternal vigilance—plus preparedness—is surely the price of liberty, and every man is his brother's keeper.

Respectfully submitted.

CHAS. E. ERTZ.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have received several telegrams from citizens of Wisconsin and other States bearing upon the Gore resolution, so called. I ask that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPLETON, WIS., February 28, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of 400 citizens held here yesterday the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"First. That you as our representative be requested to vote for Senator GORE'S bill forbidding American citizens to travel on armed merchantmen.

"Second. Believing that the European war can be shortened by a munitions-embargo act, we appeal to you to use your influence and vote for such law."

FRED HEINEMANN,
C. SEEGER,
H. A. SCHMITZ,
Committee.

RACINE, WIS., March 2, 1916.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

The Racine Trades and Labor Council passed the following resolution:

"We believe that the constituted authorities are within their rights when they stop people from entering dangerous localities, and for the same reason we believe that foolhardy Americans should be kept off of armed boats. We do not believe that one-half-billion-dollar loan should be protected by American lives, nor should this Nation be drawn into a war for above reasons. Therefore we ask you to vote for resolutions that are now being considered in Congress on refusing passports to people who think more of their business than of the welfare of their mother country."

Hon. ROBERT LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The general desire here is that the representatives of the people in the House and United States Senate vote without fail for warning United States citizens from taking passage or hire on belligerent ships, thereby avoiding a possible war.

Most respectfully,

LOS ANGELES, CAL., February 24, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Amazed at attitude of President Wilson in the present crisis. We earnestly urge you to go to the utmost limit of your power to prevent the President from creating a situation which must lead us to war with Germany. President Wilson's stand in warning Americans out of Mexico has created a precedent. No reason why this should not be adhered to now. As loyal Americans we are ever ready to stand up for and protect our country in every contingency, but have no desire to join the President in his evident wish to go down into history as an upholder of what he considers English civilization. We flatly refuse to have the destiny of our Nation jeopardized by his personal view. We are solidly behind you in everything you may do to prevent the impending catastrophe.

Respectfully,

AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE UNION,
PATRICK HENRY WINSTON, President.
J. D. METZER, Secretary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in convict-made goods, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEE of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maryland, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented a petition of the Salisbury Bros. Furniture Co., of Randolph, Vt., praying for the imposition of a duty on dyestuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Rhode Island Society, Sons of the American Revolution, praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the congregation of the Winter Hill Baptist Church, of Somerville, Mass., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KERN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Elwood, Bourbon, Mooresville, Middleboro, Hazlewood, Plainville, and Warsaw, all in the State of Indiana, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to keep Americans off belligerent merchant ships, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of Lincoln Court, No. 38, Guardians of Liberty, of Albany, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Albany, N. Y., remonstrating against appropriations being made for sectarian schools, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Livingston County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government on Christianity, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a petition adopted by the Arizona State Board of Trade, praying for an increase in armaments. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TUCSON, ARIZ., February 23, 1916.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The inclosed memorial adopted by the State Board of Trade yesterday is self-explanatory.

There is nothing that can be added concerning it beyond informing you that it was adopted by unanimous, rising vote.

I will appreciate it if you will advise us whether this meets with your ideas and inform us what may be done to further it.

Very truly, yours,

ARIZONA STATE BOARD OF TRADE,
By JOHN F. MYERS, Secretary.

(Inclosure.)

To our Congressmen:

On Tuesday, February 22, 1916, the day dedicated to the greatest American, delegates from all parts of Arizona met in Tucson to form a State organization so that all Arizonians could work as one for Arizona.

Men from Cochise, Pinal, Graham, Santa Cruz, Maricopa, and Pima Counties were present, and probably for the first time in its history the hopes, beliefs, and aspirations of Arizona were given voice truly representative of the entire State. Therefore it is not individual organizations of your constituency that greet you to-day, but your State that sends to you this message that embodies principles that lie so deep in our consciousness and so close to our hearts that to give them adequate utterance is impossible and to fail to touch upon them at all times is blasphemy.

A sacred heritage won and held through sacrifice and death is ours. We rule ourselves. None but ourselves dictate our policies or our ideals. Those of whom we think the most we make our servants, and through them determine what our political life shall be. The education of our children, the sums we shall pay in the form of taxes, the manner in which these sums shall be expended, the right to worship God as our conscience may dictate, all lie within our will and are subject to our control. But we hold this only in trust, and it is imperative that these prerogatives be handed down to our children and so transmitted to generations yet unborn.

We of to-day have expended no effort in securing or retaining this trust for which our forefathers bled and died. We have come to regard it as an established order of things that would always exist without care or thought on our part. But we have learned that we have been living in a fool's paradise through what has been well named "the valor of ignorance." We now know that we have been secure only because no great nation has seen fit to attack us. We now know what we are and what a modern war would mean to us. We know that it would come without warning: that as we now are we would have to face it; and that as we now are we are in no condition to face it. We know that to-day our Atlantic seaboard could be taken by any one of several possible foes; that invested by enemy troops, mechanized in the arts of war, it could only be retaken by a loss of life appalling in its immensity and criminal in its needlessness. "The first volunteers, the flower of our patriotic spirit, would go into the struggle unequipped, untrained, overmatched. They would fight, and they would die, probably almost to the last man. They would know this, as they know all the above facts; and they would go to their certain fate cursing the men whose shortsightedness or petty political maneuverings made such a martyrdom necessary. It will seem to them better to have paid in advance by wise legislation and mere money than to pay now usuriously in blood." (Steuart Edward White.) We know that we have the means wherewith to provide ourselves adequate protection and that this very wealth, undefended, is a temptation to attack.

And knowing this, we deplore the attitude evidenced by some Congressmen to play politics with the Nation's honor, and desire to strongly recommend that you do all in your power to combat this treason.

We do not want a mere sop tossed to our demand for protection. Some protection will not do. It must be thorough, efficient, and adequate. We want a Navy second to none, and we want it now. Not one constructed over a long period of time, but one built just as soon as is reasonably practicable. We want an Army larger than any that could possibly be landed upon our shores. In other words, we want permanent peace, and know, as you know, that this alone will give us that guaranty.

The lives of our sons, the protection of our women, and the handing down to our grandsons of our great trust, American ideals, American liberty—Americanism means so much more to us than all else that all else must give way. It is this that is at stake. Please do us the compliment of not attempting to measure it in terms of dollars.

As we have said, this is the voice of Arizona and we request that this memorial be read on the floor of Congress as it definitely and finally defines Arizona's attitude toward the flag and the country which she loves and reveres.

FEBRUARY 22, 1916.

Passed by rising vote, and secretary instructed to send copy to Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST.

JOHN F. MYERS, Secretary.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have a communication relating to the Philippine bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1916.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
United States Senator from Arkansas,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CLARKE: I beg to inclose you herewith a copy of the resolution unanimously adopted by the Philippine Assembly indorsing your amendment to the Philippine bill, which has been sent to me by cable by the speaker of the Philippine Assembly, the Hon. Sergio Osmeña. With this resolution I am thoroughly in accord.

Hoping that your amendment may pass, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

MANUEL L. QUEZON.

The resolution reads:

PHILIPPINE ASSEMBLY UNANIMOUSLY APPROVED CLARKE AMENDMENT.

Resident Commissioner MANUEL L. QUEZON has received from the speaker, Philippine Assembly, the following cablegram:

MANILA, January 25, 1916.

QUEZON, Washington:

Assembly to-night unanimously passed following resolution:

"Whereas the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill now pending before the Senate of the United States specifies the conditions under which independence shall be granted to the people of the Philippine Islands, expedites the granting of that independence, and safeguards the internal and external affairs of the said islands pending the granting of said independence;

"Whereas said amendment makes the independence provision of the preamble more clear, explicit, unequivocal, and expeditious and fixes the responsibilities which the people of the United States and the people of the Philippine Islands shall respectively assume before and after the granting of said independence: Therefore

"Resolved, That the Philippine Assembly should recommend, as it does hereby respectfully recommend, the passage of said amendment by the Congress and the President of the United States."

OSMEÑA.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1728) to amend section 1 of an act approved March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 751), entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other lands on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 193) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 647) making it unlawful to publish details of crimes and accidents in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report (No. 198) thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7585) to provide for the appointment of the register of wills of the District of Columbia by the justices of the Supreme Court of said District, submitted an adverse report (No. 197) thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 645) to provide for the closing of barber shops in the District of Columbia on Sunday, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 194) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 195) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back adversely the bill (H. R. 7571) to provide for the appointment of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and I submit an adverse report (No. 196) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask that it may lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go to the calendar, if there is objection to its indefinite postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause the settlement of the accounts of Special Agents Moore, Woodson, and Whitfield, under the treaty of 1854 with the Delaware Indians, etc., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 207) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 43) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 206) thereon.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 592) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 208) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 17) permitting H. L. Corbin to purchase certain public lands, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 205) thereon.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3900) to authorize the sale and disposal of an island in the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama, and I submit a report (No. 201) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill. The only thing involved in the bill is an island in Coosa River which will be subject to overflow when the river is improved. It is of no use to anyone now, and there are some people in Alabama who desire to buy it for a fishing club at the price the Government may fix. The bill provides that whenever the Government gets ready to overflow the island it shall have the right to do so without paying any damage. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3928) to accept the cession by the State of Washington of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Mount Rainier National Park, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 204) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the bill.

Mr. JONES. I will not ask for any action on the bill this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) to permit offerings at public sale of certain lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 202) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell the coal deposits in and under certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 203) thereon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 454) to reimburse T. C. Barrier, postmaster at Philadelphia, Miss., for registered money stolen in transit, to report it adversely. The matter to be secured by the bill has been settled, and I ask for its indefinite postponement.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 216) thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, from the Committee on Fisheries, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1859. A bill to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of New Mexico (Rept. No. 215); and

S. 3129. A bill to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Washington (Rept. No. 214).

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, from the Committee on Fisheries, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 2993. A bill to establish a fish hatchery in the State of Florida (Rept. No. 211);

S. 3261. A bill to establish an additional fish-cultural station in the State of Texas (Rept. No. 213);

S. 4067. A bill to establish a fish hatchery in the State of Alabama (Rept. No. 210);

S. 4449. A bill to establish a fish-cultural station at some point in the State of Arizona (Rept. No. 212); and

S. 4490. A bill to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma (Rept. No. 209).

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (for Mr. SHIVELY), from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11240) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 200) thereon.

He also (for Mr. SHIVELY), from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) to furnish to the Logan Monument and Volunteer Soldiers' Memorial Association a list of the names and addresses of all soldiers and sailors now living, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 199) thereon.

OSAGE OIL LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I submit certain letters and telegrams bearing upon the questions involved in Senate resolution No. 107, together with a memorandum relative thereto. I ask that the matter be printed as Part II of Senate Report No. 164, submitted by me on February 21.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that Senate resolution No. 107, relative to leasing of Osage oil lands, being Table Calendar No. 7, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4759) to establish and maintain the American school army and to organize and equip the American reserve army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4760) to authorize the change of name of the steamer Normania to William F. Stifel (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 4761) providing for the classification, appraisal, and disposal of certain lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 4762) for the relief of John T. Eaton (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A bill (S. 4763) to remove the charge of desertion on the first enlistment of Daniel B. Stone, alias Nelson Davis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4764) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes," approved January 17, 1914; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 4765) for the relief of the Mission Indians in California;

A bill (S. 4766) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause allotments to be made on Mission Indian Reservations in California; and

A bill (S. 4767) to cancel allotments made to three members of the Wintu Tribe of Indians, on the public domain, California; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 4768) for the relief of J. I. Earl (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,000 for suitable employees' quarters for physician, principal teacher, and clerks at the Indian school at Genoa, Nebr., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for general repairs and improvements at the Indian school at Genoa, Nebr., from $5,000 to $10,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of the Black Rock Harbor, N. Y., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 12193), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices from $976,000 to $1,146,000, and also to authorize the Postmaster General to utilize for the transportation of mail the pneumatic tube connecting the customhouse and the appraisers' stores in the city of New York, intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment to amend section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, so that a sum be appropriated sufficient to pay the necessary expenses of the National Forest Reservation Commission and its members, not to exceed an annual expenditure of $25,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BORAH. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as a substitute for the bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 114), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

REPORT OF DISTRICT PARK COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further bills or joint resolutions? If not, concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

Mr. STONE and Mr. GALLINGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I ask that Senate concurrent resolution No. 14, submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], may now be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think under the rule that it is proper we should first be permitted to submit original resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are other resolutions to be submitted, they will be received.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution providing for a reprint of the report of the Park Commission of the District of Columbia, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 113) was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document 166, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, known as the Park Commission Report, be reprinted for the use of the document room.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 26, 1916:

S. 4308. An act to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes.

On March 1, 1916:

S. 2497. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Anoka and Hennepin Counties, in the State of Minnesota.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

H. R. 8033. An act to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911; and

H. R. 8246. An act to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820).

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for Senate concurrent resolution No. 14, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for Senate concurrent resolution No. 14 it is proposed to insert the following:

Whereas the President of the United States——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I suggest that the resolution to which the amendment is offered is not yet before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not now before the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Of course the amendment can be offered and lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what is asked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is to have the amendment read and lie on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the request.

Mr. STONE. Well, let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. McCUMBER, as follows:

As a substitute for said Senate concurrent resolution insert the following:

"Whereas the President of the United States, acting in his diplomatic capacity, has so far been unable to secure an understanding with the central belligerent powers of Europe with reference to the attack by submarines, without notice, on merchant ships of a belligerent nation armed for defense only; and

"Whereas the President has maintained through all the negotiations that under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining the firing upon such merchant vessel by any warship without previous notice is illegal, and has notified the said central powers that American citizens have a clear right, under international law, to travel on such merchant vessels, and has further notified said central Governments that should the lives of American citizens be lost through such illegal acts the said powers would be held to strict accountability; and

"Whereas the said central powers have declared that such armed merchant vessels would be considered and treated as ships of war and subject to attack as such, without notice, and have further declared their purpose to so attack such merchant ships; and

"Whereas it is conceded that the submarine, as an instrument of warfare, was unknown when such international rule was established; and

"Whereas it is well known that such submarine, by giving notice to an armed ship, might endanger its own existence; and

"Whereas in one instance at least during the present war in Europe a submarine has been sunk and its crew destroyed by such armed merchant ship; and

"Whereas many new and novel means of warfare have been employed by all of the nations engaged in that struggle, raising new questions of rights and responsibilities, both as to neutrals and belligerents, upon which opinions and views may justly differ; and

"Whereas the President has requested that each branch of Congress shall express its conviction as to the propriety of warning the citizens of the United States to refrain from travel on such armed ships: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that, under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining, merchant vessels, though armed with a stern gun of comparatively small caliber and for defense only, has the status and rights in war of an unarmed merchant ship, but that the science of war has developed with such extraordinary rapidity during the present conflict and new weapons of warfare, including the submarine and aero fighting craft, have been employed with such far-reaching consequences and which may threaten the very life of any one of the nations involved and which may necessitate a revision of the codes of international law pertaining to the rights and duties of neutrals and belligerents in the light of such new instrumentalities; that while the strict legal right of an American citizen, under international law, to travel and ship his goods on an armed merchant vessel may be an established right, it is none the less the moral and patriotic duty of every American citizen, in view of the desperate character of the warfare now raging in Europe and the desperate situation of each and all of the warring powers, to refrain from needlessly exposing himself to danger, and, by his recklessness or audacity involving his country, or threatening to involve it, in a conflict that may seriously affect the welfare of a hundred million of his fellow citizens, and that therefore the citizens of the United States should, and they are hereby requested, to refrain from travel on such armed merchant ships until an agreement has been reached between this country and the warring nations, to the end that the endeavors of the President may not be jeopardized or halted or this Government forced into hostility with another country because of the unnecessary or reckless attitude of any citizen of the United States."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I now ask that concurrent resolution No. 14 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate concurrent resolution No. 14.

The SECRETARY. Senate concurrent resolution No. 14, by Mr. GORE——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. I rise to ask the Senator from Missouri if he will yield to me for the purpose of making a motion to lay that resolution and all substitutes for and amendments to it on the table?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. JAMES. I move that the resolution and all substitutes for it and amendments to it be laid upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORE. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, under Rule XXI of the Senate I have a right to modify the pending resolution before any action is taken upon the resolution. I desire now to exercise that sacred and immemorial right.

Mr. JAMES. I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that the motion to lay upon the table is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will request Senators to listen a moment. The Chair has some rights. The point of order is well taken that the motion to lay upon the table is not debatable. The Chair also rules that the Senator from Oklahoma has a right to amend his resolution, but not to discuss it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate that the ruling of the Chair is correct, but permit me just one sentence. I desire to explain the purpose of the change.

Mr. JAMES. I make the point of order that debate is not in order.

Mr. GORE. Very well, I shall not do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled fairly under the rules.

Mr. GORE. I send to the desk the modification which I make in the pending resolution, according to the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the resolution as amended.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all that follows the word "that," on page 2, line 2, and to insert the following:

The sinking by a German submarine, without notice or warning, of an armed merchant vessel of her public enemy, resulting in the death of a citizen of the United States, would constitute a just and sufficient cause of war between the United States and the German Empire.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution and all substitutes and amendments to it on the table, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to lay the resolution and all substitutes for it on the table. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we have a right to have the resolution read as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, Mr. President, I trust there will be order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair relies upon Members of the Senate to be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. And others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the Chair instructs the Sergeant at Arms to keep the guests of the Senate in order.

The Secretary read the resolution of Mr. GORE, as modified, as follows:

Whereas a number of leading powers of the world are now engaged in a war of unexampled proportions; and
Whereas the United States is happily at peace with all of the belligerent nations; and
Whereas it is equally the desire and the interest of the American people to remain at peace with all nations; and
Whereas the President has recently afforded fresh and signal proofs of the superiority of diplomacy to butchery as a method of settling international disputes; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on unarmed belligerent vessels has recently received renewed guaranties of respect and inviolability; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on armed belligerent vessels rather than upon unarmed vessels is essential neither to their life, liberty, or safety, nor to the independence, dignity, or security of the United States; and
Whereas Congress alone has been vested with the power to declare war, which involves the obligations to prevent war by all proper means consistent with the honor and vital interest of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the sinking by a German submarine without notice or warning of an armed merchant vessel of her public enemy, resulting in the death of a citizen of the United States, would constitute a just and sufficient cause of war between the United States and the German Empire.

Mr. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STONE. I desire to understand—and I think the Senate should understand—whether the resolution has been so amended as just read, and if that is the question now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question to which the motion to lay on the table goes, and the yeas and nays have been requested and seconded.

Mr. JONES. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is it too late to offer an amendment to the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is too late to offer anything.

Mr. GORE. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll as Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair, and Mr. ASHURST responded in the affirmative.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that the resolution now pending is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. ASHURST. I made a response. I object to any debate. My name was called and I made a response.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not care what response the Senator made; I am not asking his consent. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that resolution can not be considered in its present form, for it is an entirely new resolution and it is not an amendment to anything. It is certainly not the original resolution which has been offered, and can not be considered until to-morrow, unless by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not sustain the point of order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, the——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my name has been called and I responded. I ask that the roll call may proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the roll call ought to proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I addressed the Chair before the agile gentleman from Arizona got in.

Mr. GORE. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the roll call should proceed. The Chair did not know that the Senator from Idaho had addressed the Chair. Let the roll call proceed.

Mr. BURLEIGH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], but on this matter I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is not present. If he were present, I should not vote for this particular amendment. I should have voted against tabling the original resolution, but I should vote "yea" to table this particular resolution.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I am informed that that Senator if present would vote the same way that I would vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when Mr. LIPPITT's name was called). I am authorized by the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to state that he is unable to be on the floor to-day, that he is paired with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and that if he were here he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when his name was called). Mr. President, not being able to vote on the question directly and being prevented from giving my reasons for my vote, I ask the Senate to excuse me from voting upon the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Utah from voting? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. CHILTON. This is not the time to take it up.

Mr. BORAH. I was in the same situation myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question will be put at the conclusion of the roll call.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). If I may be permitted to do so, I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of sickness. If the original resolution——

Mr. GALLINGER. I object, Mr. President, to any statement.

Mr. STONE. I am explaining my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has no right to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. STONE. Very well. On this resolution, I——

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the Senator announce his vote.

Mr. STONE. Well, I am not going——

Mr. BORAH. That is all the Senator will do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Idaho is not authorized to say what I will or will not do.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Idaho is going to be gagged, the entire Senate will be gagged. If we are to be intellectual slaves singly, we will be intellectual slaves in a body.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state the point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order, which is the roll call.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. That is all right. I will take part in this debate just as long as the Senator from Missouri does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Idaho will be seated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to the Senator from Missouri making any observations, and I think the ruling——

Mr. STONE. I am not going to make any observations.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. STONE. On this motion I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea" upon this motion.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am informed that if my pair, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], were here he would vote the same way that I shall vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate because of serious illness in his family. He is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). As the resolution now stands, I regretfully vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I am advised as to how he would vote if he were present. I vote "yea" in the form the resolution has taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my pair, I feel at liberty to vote upon this proposition. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LANE. Under this form of the resolution, I vote "yea."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I am authorized to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the announcement has been made by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that his colleague, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], with whom I have a regular pair, would vote "yea" on this matter, and I desire to have my vote recorded as "yea." I do not think the declaration of that resolution is sound.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Before the result is announced, is it not in order for the Senate to vote upon the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was approaching that question. The rule provides that—

When a Senator declines to vote on call of his name, he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and having assigned them, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate: "Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" Which shall be decided without debate; and these proceedings shall be had after the roll call and before the result is announced.

The Senator from Utah will assign his reasons for his refusal to vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can state them in no more succinct way than I have already done. Not being able to vote on the question directly and being prevented from giving my reasons for my vote, I ask the Senate to excuse me from voting upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senator from Utah, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Utah is excused from voting on the question.

The roll call resulted—yeas 68, nays 14, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion to lay the resolution and all amendments thereto upon the table, the yeas are 68 and the nays are 14. So the resolution and all amendments thereto are laid upon the table.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 108, proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 108, by Mr. JONES——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to withdraw the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has the right to withdraw the resolution. It is withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. I will offer the resolution at another time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

PORTRAIT OF JOHN LANGDON.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have another resolution to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon. The Chair thought there was no further morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a resolution, and I will ask the courtesy of the Senate to occupy a few minutes in some observations upon it. They will be very brief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library is hereby authorized to have made an oil portrait of John Langdon, the first President pro tempore of the Senate, to be hung in the main corridor of the Senate, the cost not to exceed the sum of $1,500, and to paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I had risen and addressed the Chair, morning business having been closed, and the Senator from New Hampshire asked to introduce a resolution. I did not object to that, but I think I am entitled to the floor at this time. I will say to the Senator that I shall occupy the floor for not to exceed five minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. As there is so much confusion in the Chamber and the galleries, and as I desire to occupy two or three minutes on a matter connected with the resolution, I will withdraw the resolution for the present and submit it at some other time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reason why the Chair announced that the morning business was closed was upon the assumption of the Chair that no further resolutions were to be introduced; but there being a resolution to be introduced, the Chair had to withdraw that ruling.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I intended to vote against the original resolution offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and did vote against it in its modified form. The remarks that I want to make now have particular reference to the resolution as originally introduced, and I desire to put them in the RECORD at this time.

I voted against the resolution, first and chiefly, because we are informed that the pendency of the resolution has created an impression in foreign countries, and especially at the court of Germany, that there is a division in our councils, and that the State Department does not have back of its demands the support of the Government and the people, and that therefore the State Department finds itself embarrassed and weakened in the negotiations now pending. I think it highly important that this false impression should be immediately removed. There inevitably always will be differences of opinion as to the wisest way in which to meet and solve any great and difficult question. These differences of opinion exist among us, but they are differences relating only to the best policy to be pursued for the welfare of America. They are not differences of opinion growing out of a desire to serve the interest of any foreign power. Such opposing opinions as we may entertain will be solved by ourselves solely in the interests of the United States of America and without regard to the interests of other nations, and when and however solved the American people will stand as a unit. Let all the world understand the fact.

Second. I voted against the resolution because I believe this not to be the opportune time to pass such a resolution.

Third. I voted against the resolution because I am not in favor of either expressly or by implication yielding the rights of American citizens upon the high seas.

Fourth. We have reasonable grounds to believe that important information may reach us within the next few days which may show that such orders have been issued as will in fact make certain vessels heretofore regarded as peaceful merchant ships auxiliary cruisers, in which event this Government may see fit to take the position that such vessels shall no longer be regarded or treated as merchantmen.

I intend what I have said to be a mere epitome of my reasons and not at all as fully covering my views.

I deem this the proper time to make a further observation. Some things were said in debate yesterday and many things have been said in the press which, in my judgment, would have been better unsaid. It is of the highest importance that all the world shall be given to understand that upon any question involving the rights of the American Government and American citizens our great people stand as a unit, and that they will uphold, sustain, and defend those rights, if need be, to the last extremity.

I insist, therefore, that statements impugning the motives of Senators or of the President or of any portion of our great people ought not to be heard upon the floor of the Senate, and should not be elsewhere expressed. I believe that a German statesman reading the declaration of a Senator made publicly in this Chamber to the effect that resolutions had been introduced in the interests of Germany, and that the time has come when the question, Shall we exclaim "America first," or, shall we sing "Deutschland über Alles"? will find in such statements more consolation, more encouragement, and a greater evidence of division in our counsels than he could probably gain from the mere introduction of a temperate resolution requesting our citizens to not ship upon belligerent vessels. I believe this, because the effect of the utterance is to assert that in this Nation, nay, even in the Congress of the United States, there are those who are considering the interests of Germany rather than the interests of the United States. I regard all such expressions as unfortunate, and I assert that all such statements are groundless in fact.

There was much talk here yesterday of traitors to this country. I affirm it to be true, and I certify it to the world as a fact, that while there may be differences of judgment and opinion among Congressmen as to the best things to do for the sake of America there is not in the Congress of the United States a single man who in any contest between the United States and a foreign power will not render to this country an undivided and deathless loyalty. I affirm it to be a fact that, out of the 100,000,000 citizens of the United States, it would be difficult to find a thousand men who would not manifest the same degree of loyalty. To assert otherwise is to utter an infinite slander against the bravest and most loyal people of this earth.

Neither do I think we gain anything by asserting that when a man takes a certain position which happens to accord with the position of one or the other of the belligerents he thereby sides with that belligerent against America.

Let me state the concrete question. England claims the right to arm her merchantmen, and it is asserted, whether truthfully or not I can not say, because the evidence has not yet been produced, that by order in council commanders of these ships have been instructed to fire upon and sink German submarines. Upon the other hand, Germany asserts that by the issuance of this alleged order England has made of her armed merchantmen vessels of war.

The United States has nothing to do with that controversy, except in so far as it affects her rights which, of course, embrace the rights of her citizens. It is necessary that the United States shall assume some position. If it shall take the ground that the armed vessels, acting under the supposed instructions I have referred to, are in fact war vessels, that decision will necessarily be somewhat favorable to Germany, because it will accord with Germany's contentions. Whereupon excitable and extreme individuals might exclaim, "You have decided the question in favor of Germany and against the United States!" Upon the other hand, if we should take the position that the vessels armed and instructed as aforesaid are not war vessels, even though they should be engaged in the war and acting under the authority of instructions from the British Government actually sink war vessels of the German Navy, to wit, its submarines, then the same excitable and extreme individuals might by the same kind of logic declare we have "decided the question in favor of the allies and against the interests of the United States." Manifestly we must, when we decide the question, decide it in favor of the contentions of one or the other of the belligerents, because there are but two sides to the question, and when we take the side favored by one we must take the side against the other.

But, sir, I utterly deny that when we have rendered a decision we have decided in favor of one of the belligerents and against the United States. Upon the contrary, we will decide the question upon its merits, and when we have rendered that decision it will be a decision in favor of the United States, not against the United States.

I utterly abominate and repudiate that kind of statement which attributes to an American statesman or an American citizen a desire to act against the interests of the United States merely because the conclusion he arrives at may happen to accord with the position taken by one or the other of the belligerents. If we decide the question at all, necessarily our decision will favor the contentions of one side or the other, but it does not by any means follow that in rendering such decision we have acted against the interests of the United States.

This is no time for casting aspersions upon the good faith of each other. It is regrettable that any expression impugning the motive or patriotism and loyalty of any man should have been uttered. The truth is that while there may be differences of opinion as to what is the politic and wise thing to do there is no difference of opinion as to our duty to maintain the honor, the dignity, and the rights of the American Nation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the resolution submitted by me having accomplished its purpose, I withdrew it when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] rose to move to lay it on the table. It is in the following words:

Whereas this is a Government of the people, by the people, for the people, and not of any individual, by any individual, or for any individual; and

Whereas it is contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government that the people should be involved in war through the decision or by the act of any one man; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States of America expressly provides that "the Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy"; and

Whereas the act of declaring war should not be merely the ratification and confirmation by Congress of the judgment and decision of a single man, but should be the sober judgment and mature decision of the people through their representatives in Congress upon the causes and justification for such declaration; and

Whereas an assault upon the national honor would be a justification for a declaration of war; and

Whereas no one man is the sole custodian of the Nation's honor; and

Whereas the issue of war is too momentous and fraught with too grave consequences to the people to be decided by any one man; and

Whereas the people of this country are not seeking war and do not desire to be led into it, but, if involved, would be united as one man in support of the Government; and

Whereas by the arbitrary act or demand of its Chief Executive the people may be placed in a situation from which they can not withdraw without humiliation and be involved in war for causes the justice of which they have not been permitted to pass upon: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America that any issue claimed to affect the national honor should be referred for its decision to the Congress of the United States, and no ultimatum should be sent to any belligerent power and no severance of diplomatic relations be brought about by Executive action until after the advice and consent of Congress.

Mr. President, we have decided nothing to-day except that the Senate can be gagged absolutely. We have not passed upon the issue presented in any way. We have like ostriches stuck our heads in the sand and we think that no one sees us. If the note means anything, it actually ties the hands of the President, and will bear no other construction.

I voted against tabling the Gore resolution because on general principles I am against tabling resolutions, for the motion is always made for the purpose of either cutting off debate or evading the issue. I am in favor of passing upon this question squarely. That is what we should have done to reflect honor upon the great body we are supposed to be and ought to be.

Have we complied with the request of the President of the United States? I suppose that what we have done was intended to be a compliance with his request. What did he say in his letter to Mr. Pou that he wanted? This is what he said:

I therefore feel justified in asking that your committee will permit me to urge an early vote upon the resolutions with regard to travel on armed merchantmen which have recently been so much talked about—in order that there may be afforded an immediate opportunity for full public discussion and action upon them.

This is the full public discussion that we have had, motions to lay upon the table, under which no man can speak until after the motion is passed upon.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not in touch with the subterranean passage?

Mr. JONES. I think I know about it and the character of it, but I did not see fit to suggest it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. May I inquire of the Senator from Washington if what he calls full discussion on this subject in the Senate had been had when we would have reached a vote upon it?

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, a question that may involve war for this country is a question that ought to be discussed until everybody has reached a clear decision and until the people know thoroughly why we take whatever action we may take.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I do not know when it would have been decided, but it would have been decided in accordance with the honest judgment of the Senate and in accordance with its standing and dignity as a part of the war-declaring body.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. It is quite evident that notwithstanding the vote we are going to have a discussion.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senate that I shall not take over three or four minutes; that is all.

Mr. THOMAS. I was merely going to ask the question whether your discussion, if you desire to have one and get it before the country, can not be made just as well in the way this body is in the habit of doing, and that is by holding a post-mortem inquiry after disposing of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. I am not going to engage in any post-mortem discussion. It is very easy to introduce another resolution like this to-morrow. The Senate has not passed upon the resolution yet, and everybody knows that——

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad——

Mr. JONES. Everybody knows that we have not settled the proposition. We have not reached a decision upon it. We have evaded it. We have voted blindly, and instead of assisting the President we have, in fact, embarrassed him. When Senators really see what they have done they will certainly regret their hasty action. The President is not advised as to the sentiment of the Senate on this proposition, and the people abroad know that we have not passed upon it. If the President, the House, and the Senate desire that something shall be done that will speak to the countries abroad, we ought to have voted squarely on the proposition. It should have been amended and put into shape expressing the mature and patriotic judgment of the great American people.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest to the Senator that this question was discussed yesterday, and there seemed to be ample opportunity without anyone being restricted in his liberty. Why renew the discussion again?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. It is my judgment that the discussion yesterday was the cause of the action to-day. There were some things which came out in the discussion which it was not desired to have repeated or more fully discussed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just in connection with the discussion of yesterday——

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who presented here the defense of the President and presented it on a very low plane, to the address just delivered to day by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not like to cut off discussion or debate.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator was anxious to have something settled and directly passed upon, why did he withdraw his resolution?

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] was on his feet not to say let us pass upon the resolution on its merits but to move to lay it on the table.

Mr. MYERS. You could have gotten a vote on it just the same.

Mr. JONES. No; we could not have gotten a vote upon the merits on a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MYERS. It is the same thing practically.

Mr. JONES. No; it is not the same thing, and the Senator will find that out when he sees what he has voted on to-day. The Senate would not have passed upon its merits. If the Senator from Montana thinks it is the same thing to vote upon a motion to lay upon the table as it is to vote upon a proposition, he is welcome to that opinion.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Washington seemed to think it was the same thing, and that was the reason apparently why he beat a hasty retreat.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have been stating that I did not think it was the same thing. Of course I knew how you were going to vote. I knew what you would do on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. You would vote to pass not upon the merits of the resolution but to lay it upon the table. If the Senator from Montana hereafter is charged with having voted to declare that it is not within the province of the Congress of the United States to pass upon any question that involves our national honor which may lead to war, he can say that he did not vote on that but upon a motion to lay it on the table. There was no need, however, to vote on my resolution. It had already accomplished its purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield one more minute?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. As long as something has been said about my vote, I want to say that if the motion had been made to lay on the table the resolution of the Senator from Washington I would have voted for it. If his resolution had come directly before the Senate, I would have voted against it. If the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] had in its original form come directly before the Senate, I would, with hearty good will, have voted against it.

Mr. JONES. The Senator has not given me any information that I did not have before. [Manifestations in the galleries.]

Mr. MYERS. I will say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will not keep repeating warnings to the occupants of the galleries. They must obey the rules of the Senate or the galleries will be vacated.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator knows where I stand and I thank him for the tribute. I agree with him. There is no shuffling or evading the issue in my opinion.

Mr. JONES. Then I suppose the Senator would vote to lay on the table rather than to have the issue come up squarely. I only say that because of his vote; that is all.

Mr. MYERS. I always vote to kill a bad thing by the quickest way.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would have been through before this had I not been interrupted. I had thought of discussing this matter at considerable length, but I do not intend to do so at this time. It is enough for the country to see the methods that the Senate under some force of some kind, of some character from somewhere will take upon such a momentous question as we have before us, and that is not settled by this vote. It is still pending. It will come up again. But I do hope, Mr. President, that this agitation and what has been done will serve the purpose of inducing American citizens to refrain from putting themselves on these armed belligerent ships. In the interest of the United States and in the interest of their country, I hope that no one hereafter, until this terrific contest is closed, will place himself in a position where he may not only lose his own life but bring our country into war and into trouble.

He may have the technical right to travel on these ships, although I doubt it. But, Mr. President, a man may be so reckless, in my judgment, of the rights of others as to forfeit rights which he may have. The peace of a nation should not abide upon the result of any individual's recklessness.

The Nation's honor should hang on no man's foolhardiness. Homes should not be made desolate and hearts should not be broken and the land should not be bathed in blood in behalf of any man's cupidity or pleasure. Uphold the Nation's honor—yes, with every drop of American blood, if need be; but American blood is too precious for a single drop to be shed on the altar of selfishness, recklessness, or commercialism.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me. I shall be through in just a moment.

It is not asking much of the citizen to ask him to stay off these ships. Is it possible that there are men and women who are not patriotic enough to do this little thing in behalf of their country and humanity? We denounce as cowardly and unpatriotic the man who will not offer his life in time of war to defend his country. What denunciation is too severe for the man who is not willing to forego the exercise of a mere personal right of profit or pleasure in time of peace to save his country from the horrors of war?

Mr. President, the resolution which I introduced was not introduced for political purposes; there was no thought of partisanship in it; it was simply introduced in behalf of the United States and the people of the United States, and not in the interest of Germany, not in the interest of the allies. It has served a good purpose. The attention of the people has been centered in the situation now confronting us. I appeal to the people of this country that they refrain in time of peace from doing those things that may lead us into war. Patriotism and humanity demand this from all of us.

Mr. REED and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk, and I ask to have read, an article from the London Times of February 10, 1916. I hope the Members of the Senate will listen to this article, particularly to the first and last parts of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARMED LINERS—THE AMERICAN NOTE CRITICIZED—HEAVIER GUNS NEEDED.

[By our naval correspondent.]

The number of cases in which merchant ships have put up a good fight against submarines is increasing, and successful escapes of liners owing to their carrying a gun are more frequent. Not all such encounters get into the papers, but within the last few weeks three good examples, among others, have been made known.

The P. and O. steamer Kashgar, when off Malta on her way to India, saw a submarine's periscope and fired at it, obliging the boat to dive. It reappeared on the opposite side of the liner and was again fired at, if not hit, when the submarine dived and was seen no more. The Ellerman liner City of Marseilles also had a similar encounter off the Sardinian coast 10 days earlier. In her case the submarine opened fire without any warning, but after two shots the liner's gun got to work and discharged eight shells at the "U" boat, after which the latter disappeared. The third instance is that of a French ship, the Plata, owned by the Transports Maritimes, which on January 27 sighted a submarine half a mile away. Fire was opened from the stern of the steamer, and the hostile craft, believed to be struck in a vital part, soon dived and made off. The action of the Clan Mactavish, though it did not meet with the success it deserves, points to the readiness with which the merchant seamen can attack when threatened. Her captain and crew fought in a manner which might well have been successful had their assailant been a submarine, but which was unavailing against the more heavily armed raider.

MR. LANSING'S FORMULA.

The recurrence of such incidents should not be without its effect upon the Government in dealing with the note which Mr. Lansing is reported to have addressed to the European belligerent powers on the subject of the arming of merchantmen and its relation to submarine warfare. The substance of the note was published in the Times on January 29, and its chief point, it will be remembered, was that armed merchantmen might be denied entry into American ports, except under the same conditions as applied to warships, unless the powers to which they belonged subscribed to the principles proposed by the United States in a formula under five headings. Each power is asked to make this declaration, on condition that a similar declaration is made by its enemies. The effect of the acceptance of this formula would be the virtual disarmament of merchant ships. Indeed, the American State Department argues "that grave legal doubt exists as to the right of a merchant ship to carry armament." The acceptance of this proposal would be suicidal—first, because it would hamper and injure us out of all proportion to our enemies, supposing they accepted it, and, secondly, because no faith can be placed in a German promise not to mount guns in merchant vessels.

Of the five sections in the American proposal, the first, second, and fourth are correct enough and could be accepted, while the fifth is meaningless in practice. It affirms that "only if it is impossible to supply a prize crew or to convoy the merchant ship is sinking justified, and that in that case the passengers and crew must be removed to a place of safety": but it is always impossible for a submarine to supply a prize crew, and thus she would always be justified in destroying prizes. We take our stand firmly on the necessity of taking ships before a prize court. If the Germans can not do this, they have no real complaint, for the established principles of international law are perfectly clear, although the enemy has chosen deliberately to disregard them. The third clause, however, "that a belligerent-owned merchant ship should promptly obey an order to stop," has no justification. That a neutral ship should stop if ordered is an accepted principle, but no twisting of precedents can warrant the assertion that one of our merchant ships must do so. It is true she is liable to be fired on if she does not, but she has a perfect right to try to escape.

AN IMMEMORIAL RIGHT.

It is the doubts thrown in the American note upon the status of armed merchantmen, however, which have attracted most attention. As early in the war as September 26, 1914, and subsequently, I have shown that merchant ships have been armed from time immemorial, and their right to resist capture had never been disputed until the Germans began to make their numerous efforts to undermine our power at sea. In the past every merchant ship went armed, and a royal proclamation of 1672 instructed them to assist and defend each other against any enemy if attacked, to which end they were to be well provided with muskets, small shot, "hand granadoes," and other ammunition. I have before pointed out that the historical evidence in support of the practice is overwhelming, and it is inconceivable that the British Government should make any concession in this direction.

The American note connects the arming of merchantmen with the weakness of submarines, contending that the introduction of submarine warfare has altered the relative status of an armed merchant ship "and limited the defensive powers of submarines, rendering them liable to successful attack by such armed merchantmen." The allied Governments can not be expected to suffer, and the Germans to profit, by this. Let the belligerents abide by the requirements of international law, which prescribe one method only—that of detention, visit, and search. How can the merchantmen be reasonably expected to give up their guns in the face of the aeroplane and Zeppelin attacks which are growing in frequency? Germany, moreover, has recently sent out a merchant vessel with a formidable armament to attack commerce, showing the imperative need of the allies not only arming their trading ships but of arming them more heavily than in the past.

Mr. STONE and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that on Tuesday next, at the close of the routine morning business, provided the business of the Senate then permits, I shall ask leave to address the Senate and to express at length my views on the subject of armed merchantmen and related subjects.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to present a resolution upon the pending subject, and ask that it may go over under the rules. (S. Con. Res. 15.)

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have the resolution read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state that it is practically the same as the one which has already been read.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I take it for granted that that matter will be disposed of without further action on the part of the Senate. Does the Senator from North Dakota desire to address the Senate on it?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I should prefer to address the Senate on the subject when I can bring it up; but I want to say to the Senator that, of course, the subject matter will be discussed either to-day or to-morrow, and I hope that we shall have an opportunity of presenting our case fairly and justly.

There may be those Senators who feel that after they have addressed the Senate upon a certain subject there is nothing more to be said, and that, therefore, it is then perfectly appropriate to move to table the proposition; but there is some mild disagreement to that view, and I shall have to place myself in the line of those who disagree with that proposition——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from North Dakota is wasting his time if he is addressing his remarks to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. And who feel that they should have an opportunity to argue this question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I must confess that I am not satisfied with the course that things have taken here to-day. I think that the question which was presented to the Senate called for more definite, rational, and courageous action than it has received. I think the Senate of the United States has, in a manner not creditable to it, abdicated its constitutional authority to be heard about great questions that affect the peace and welfare of this country. Whilst I say that, I do not say it offensively; but I can not refrain from expressing the opinion that the manner in which this great question was disposed of is not consistent with the dignity nor compatible with the courage which should characterize public action here.

There is no use overlooking the fact that we have come a second time to a place in the history of this country where it may be said, as it was said of Rome, that "there is a party for Cæsar and a party for Pompey, but there is no party for Rome," and that great country, republic and empire alike, disappeared and to-day its institutions are as one with those of Nineveh and Tyre. It is our duty to see to it that no such fate shall soon overtake us.

I think this question ought to be squarely and fairly met by the Congress of the United States to-day. It is one of the most momentous questions that has been submitted to a Government in modern times. You can not dodge it by turning its settlement over to somebody else, and you ought not to desire to do so. You have an affirmative duty to perform which you can not evade and preserve your reputation for manliness and independence.

Unfortunately the world has not rid itself of the dangers of war, and still more unfortunately, the horrors of war have been increasing all the time. It has been the theoretic and academic boast of this country that our institutions have been laid and developed along lines that make such catastrophes in our affairs a virtual impossibility; that the principles of justice that characterize our administration, and the larger part which we concede to the individual citizen in developing the policies of his own Government make it a practical impossibility for such cataclysms as we now witness elsewhere to be a matter of actual and near concern to us. But it seems we are deluding ourselves. The best we can do now in the way of demonstration is to regret that we have not given a concrete exhibition of that boast in some form that may be of practical value to mankind.

I believe that, if we had preserved from the beginning a condition of absolute neutrality, the unfortunate struggle now raging in Europe would now be well on its way to an adjustment. There is no overlooking the fact that all our public acts and declarations have led in a certain direction, and have created a distinct impression that official America, at least, is anxiously interested in the success of one of the parties to this great conflict. It will require no inspired ingenuity to guess which one, because it has almost become a saying that anybody who at this day professes to be neutral must be in sympathy with the Germans, since everybody else occupying an official position seems to have taken his stand on the other side of the controversy. Now, I do not indorse that view; I do not believe that it correctly represents the true spirit of America; I do not believe it correctly represent the Congress of the United States. I believe that the interests, the history, and the traditions of this Government commit it to a policy of entire fairness and absolute neutrality, and that this attitude should be reflected by those who assume to speak by authority when they represent this country in connection with this great struggle.

If existing international laws and rules seem, by virtue of their attempted adaptation to existing facts, to favor one of the belligerent parties, there can be no good reason why we should not make the further inquiry as to whether or not we are compelled to persist in a course that puts us in an attitude of distinct unfriendliness to the other.

I have thought all along, and I believe now, that the Congress of the United States ought to supplement some existing international rules and regulations with further declarations, which it has ample and undisputed authority to make. No code of laws at this period of the world's history is complete; otherwise there would be no excuse for this Congress and like assemblies remaining in perpetual session. Defects are being discovered all the time. Principles are becoming obsolete by reason of the progress of the world in connection with mechanical and industrial arts and sciences. Rules of action applicable to conditions of fact with which we were called upon to deal yesterday will become obsolete to-morrow. New laws will be necessary to meet these new conditions.

Now, for example, take the matter of exporting arms by neutrals to belligerents. The process involves the rights and interests of three parties—the two belligerents and the neutral exporter. It is not an unneutral act to furnish with arms one or both of the belligerents, provided it be done upon equal terms of opportunity, and yet it is also a feature of applicable law, as well defined and as perfectly recognized as the other, that the Government of the neutral exporter has the right, by the enactment of municipal law, to prevent the export of arms and munitions to either belligerent, and its action in doing so can not be justly deemed under international law to be an unneutral or otherwise unfriendly act.

As illustrating the point I am presenting I call attention to the following extract from Oppenheimer on International Law, a recognized authority on international law in England, published in 1906. The extract is from volume 2 and is as follows:

SEC. 350. In contradistinction to supply to belligerents by neutrals such supply by subjects of neutrals is lawful, and neutrals are therefore not obliged, according to their duty of impartiality, to prevent such supply. Consequently, when, in August, 1870, during the Franco-German War, Germany lodged complaints with the British Government for not prohibiting its subjects from supplying arms and ammunition to the French Government, Great Britain correctly replied that she was by international law not under the obligation to prevent her subjects from committing such acts. Of course, such neutral as is anxious to avoid all controversy and friction may by his municipal law order his subjects to abstain from such acts, as, for instance, Switzerland and Belgium did during the Franco-German War. But such injunctions arise from political prudence, and not from any obligation imposed by international law.

It will thus be seen that both Belgium and Switzerland exercised that right during the Franco-Prussian War, to the acceptance and with the acquiescence of each of the then belligerents. No claim was then made that such action was unneutral nor has any such claim at any time been made, when that right has been exercised as it has been on more than a score of occasions by the great Governments of the world. Take the controversy which has provoked this discussion and thus created the supposed necessity for doing the things that have occurred on this occasion. There are likewise three parties interested in this particular controversy. The allies, the central powers, and the people of the United States, as a neutral likely to be injured.

The allies insist that they have a right to adequately arm their merchantmen for what they consider defensive purposes. Just what that shall be is a matter for them to determine. They are under no duty to consult us about this feature, nor are they in an attitude where we can insist upon the right to be consulted. Mr. Asquith is reported to have said in the British Parliament recently, when he was confronted with some declaration of international law made in part by England on some former occasion, that he could not then devote any of his time to the discussion of the niceties of any code, because the life of Great Britain was at stake, and the logic that proceeded from that situation was the only law that he was at liberty to recognize or apply at that time.

The allies are, therefore, the judge of how they shall arm their ships. They know the danger with which they must cope. The Germans are likewise at liberty to decide upon their own method and equipment for assailing those ships when they are armed and sent out to sea. It is primarily no business of theirs if we safeguard our people and their interests by the exercise of all the powers at our disposal as the legislative branch of our Nation. We have absolute control over our own nationals on the sea and off of it. We have a right to amend our laws in such a way that our nationals shall not seek passage upon those armed ships, except upon the condition that they deliberately assume the responsibility for whatever consequences come from that rash act. We are entirely within our rights—and I know that we will fall short of our duty if we do not exercise it—when we say to any person owing allegiance to the United States: "If you go upon one of those ships, as you are at liberty to do—and we are not disposed to deprive you of your option to do so—you take your safety in your own hands, and whatever international consequence arise from that shall not include our Government as a party, directly or indirectly, concerned therein. We simply declare that we shall decline to follow aboard such ships with a promise of protection from the United States when you voluntarily enter upon that perilous journey."

That announcement will complete our part in the transaction. We have a right to say that without giving offense to anyone. We have a right to make that declaration without giving anybody the right to call us to account for it.

In adopting this course we do not interfere, nor pretend to interfere, with the warfare that is being conducted by the belligerents; but we simply say to them: "You have no vested right to have forever continued a course of action on the part of a few of our nationals who perish in putting themselves in places of unusual peril, and thereby, under the old conception of national duty, bring us into a position where we shall be called upon to take part in the struggle against your adversary." Neither belligerent has any right, directly or indirectly, to censor or supervise the degree of national protection we may assure to our own people.

I think we have the right to pass a resolution declaring that our people go upon armed merchantmen of either belligerent at their own risk, and I think it is our duty to pass it now. We have already failed to take advantage of our opportunities on so many splendid occasions that I do not think this one should be permitted to pass without availing ourselves of it.

Those who just at this juncture are particularly anxious to magnify the importance of the Presidency pretend to think that once the President has declared an opinion or defined a purpose to enforce an existing law thereupon all legislative powers are paralyzed. I have about as much respect for the President and about as much interest in him personally and politically as anybody on this floor; but I have not any such interest in him, nor have I any such interest in the Democratic Party, nor have I any such interest in a seat in this body, as will excuse me in omitting to do anything I can to prevent this country from becoming engaged in the present European conflict. I shall not remain silent; I shall not occupy an ambiguous attitude with reference to the matter.

Other Presidents have been advised by the Senate and the House of Representatives with reference to the presidential duty in connection with international matters, and no intimation was then made that that was an improper exercise of authority or that it was a censorious and unwelcome supervision of the presidential office to have it done. The Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution, directed Andrew Jackson to recognize the independence of Texas. He said, in his message December 21, 1836:

In this view on the ground of expediency I am disposed to concur, and do not therefore consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and the Legislature in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the Constitution and most safe that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with the previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished.

Henry Clay, in connection with the same matter, submitted to Congress a report on the same subject, in which he said:

If, in any instance, the President should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of Congress, as was done in relation to the Republics formed out of Spanish America.

Instances are not wanting in our history where Congress has directed the President to enter into treaties. No conscientious President, devoted to his duty and to his country, would take the slightest offense or develop the slightest spirit of resentment at the action of Congress in saying: "That law as it now stands imposes upon you the obligation of enforcing something that we do not want enforced; and in the exercise of another power, exclusively in our hands, we propose to put limitations upon it so that you will not be called upon to discharge that disagreeable and unprofitable obligation. We will arrange it so that our nationals, when they undertake to travel on these armed merchantmen, shall go at their own risk and assume their own responsibilities." That is all that it is necessary to say.

The American citizen has been so accustomed to exercising an unbounded liberty that any restriction upon it seems an imposition and unfair. Therefore, in deference to that extravagant notion of his own importance, I am perfectly willing to let him travel if he wants to, so that he does so upon condition that if he is lost "the subsequent proceedings shall interest him no more." He is simply taking his stand where he elected to take it; and I believe that the average citizen, if interrogated about it, would say that if he saw proper to travel upon one of those ships and was lost that he would want no controversy that would involve his country about his actions. Whilst our citizens put extravagant limits upon their own liberty, they are also fair and courageous; and if one of them puts himself in an attitude of that kind after he has been notified that the Government of the United States does not concern itself further about him than to see that his grave is kept green, that he will accept the consequences of the bargain if he sees proper to make it.

I had arranged for a presentation in somewhat more logical order the things I had to say on this occasion, and I expected to fortify these observations by some of the documents that might be presented here in support of my contention; but I believe I shall content myself to postpone that until this matter shall regularly come under consideration.

I did not altogether like the text of the Gore resolution in its original form.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right now?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall be very glad to answer the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. When is this subject likely to come under consideration in such manner that it can be debated?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is under consideration now in a partial way. If the Senator can debate it any better than I can do it, I shall be glad to have him do so, if he is on my side.

Mr. McCUMBER. I may agree with the Senator, and I may want to debate it, but I have not yet had any opportunity, because, if the Senator offers a resolution——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am debating it now, but not very well.

Mr. McCUMBER (continuing). There probably will be a motion to table it immediately.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator need not concern himself about that. We have the water-power bill under consideration. That is a blanket permission to anybody to speak on any subject.

I was not in favor of the Gore resolution as an original proposition, in the form in which it was introduced at first, because it sought to ask our citizens to give up the privilege of traveling on the ships. I do not think it is necessary to go that far. In any remedial legislation curtailing existing privileges it is always wise to limit the restrictive provisions within the narrowest limits consistent with the accomplishment of the thing you have in view. I am perfectly willing to let our people travel if they want to, but I am unwilling to make the consequences a matter of international controversy if they do. Now, that is all that is necessary. As to this last substitute provision that the Senator introduced, I did not understand why it was done, and I did not even understand the modified resolution itself. In hearing it read from the desk it seemed to me to reverse the whole order of his contention and to be designed to get the Senate in the attitude of voting down something that it ostensibly favored. My recollection of the text is that it would be a cause of war if one of these armed merchantmen should be destroyed and the life of an American citizen lost. The Senate voted against it. I am sure it did not vote against it wittingly, because no such proposition was under consideration and nobody was called upon to state his own attitude.

I think it is best to deal frankly with all these great questions, to deal honestly with them, to deal with them in such a way as to show that we definitely and distinctly know the responsibility that rests upon those of us who are to administer the affairs of 100,000,000 of the most enlightened people the sun ever shone upon. You will gain nothing by dodging. You will gain nothing by bartering off your prerogatives in fear or overdependence on somebody else, even if that somebody does control the pie counter. It is time for every American citizen and every American official to courageously assume his part of the responsibility and to fearlessly and patriotically exercise the power that is lodged with him and his station.

The present trend of this Government in the present world conflagration is wrong and it ought to be changed. It is time enough for us to go to war when a real and substantial cause is presented. Whoever engages in war with us will find at the end of it that he has been in a conflict of some magnitude; but we are not going about with chips on our shoulders, pretending to stand to the verge of war for ancient academic practices that even college professors are not agreed about. It takes a long and laborious and involved argument and a wide investigation of almost obsolete literature to determine whether the preponderance of probabilities of regularity is upon one side or the other. The American people did not send us here either to declare war under an obscured condition of that kind, nor to permit it to be declared by anybody else. It is time enough to fight when you have to. In this modern day conflicts are said to be very dangerous. So far as I am concerned, this country is not going into this war until somebody does something that should be deemed justifiable cause for it, and up to the present time nothing of that kind has happened.

I hope somewhere, on this pending water-power bill or somewhere else—and that is a good place to put an amendment of that kind, if you can not put it anywhere else——

A SENATOR. Provided you can get the votes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Well, we will get the votes if there is enough red-blooded American citizenship on this floor to put it on there—that our citizens will be notified that if they travel on these ships they do it at their own risk. That is all that it is necessary to change in the provisions of existing international rules and regulations. This much these same rules and regulations recognize our full right to do without consulting anybody or giving cause for offense to anybody when we do so act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I was the only Senator from the New England States who voted against tabling the amended resolution, I want to say a word.

I voted against tabling the resolution because I felt the matter ought to have been fully debated and then voted upon intelligently. I confess I did not understand what the amendment was that the Senator from Oklahoma submitted to his original resolution, as it had never been before the Senate until it was read from the desk. My position is that I want in every honorable way to do what I can to avoid war. I have believed that it would be a wise thing for our Government to advise American citizens not to travel on armed belligerent ships, and I should have voted for that if the question had been presented to the Senate in that form.

I agree very fully with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] in his assertion that we ought to make an affirmative declaration in some form—I wish it might be put in the form of a statute—that American citizens traveling on armed belligerent ships in time of war do so at their own peril.

Mr. President, I feel intensely, very deeply, that we ought not to allow anything to occur that we can prevent that could by any possibility involve the United States in the great war that is now devastating Europe. That has been my only purpose; and had I had an opportunity to vote for a resolution advising the President to recommend to the citizens of this Republic that they should not travel on those ships, I should have voted for it. Had the resolution that the Senator from Oklahoma, amended as he proposed, and which I have examined since the vote was taken, been directly presented to the Senate, I should have voted against it.

That is all I care to say on this subject. I think we are entitled to fully debate this question in the open at some time, and I trust that some resolution may be submitted that will give us a chance to do that thing, and if that time comes I shall take occasion to discuss it. I agree with what has been said by other Senators that we have in our action to-day reached no conclusion one way or the other. I feel that we are entitled to an opportunity to express our views and to vote our convictions, and not have a motion to lay on the table carried, as it was to-day, by brute force.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have had but one rule to guide my conduct since this unfortunate conflict in Europe began and some difficulties closer home began, and that was, wherever I conceived an American right to exist, and it was challenged upon the part of any country or nation, to meet that challenge without vacillation or compromise. It has been immaterial to me whether the persons, being American citizens, were slain upon the sea or in Mexico, whether the nation responsible for it was large or small. I measured my duty by the fact that an American citizen's life had been sacrificed and an American right had been invaded. I have known no other rule, and I do not at any time intend to observe any other rule.

I should therefore, had I been permitted to do so, have voted for the principle that an American citizen has a right to travel upon a merchant ship armed for defensive purposes. If a resolution embodying that principle in any intelligent way had been presented, I should have voted for it; or if a resolution embodying the opposite principle had been tendered I would have voted against it. It is a right which has been established under international law for these 500 years, and in my judgment this is not the time for the great American Republic to begin to temporize and compromise with reference to those national rights which have been so long established and which every belligerent power has at some time in its history recognized. If these principles of international law are made unsound by changed conditions of warfare, now is not the time for us to change them. Our purposes in doing so would be misconstrued and misunderstood. Indeed, I think there is nothing so dangerous in great emergencies as vacillation, nothing so calculated to bring on war as a timid policy with reference to national rights.

We are now in the midst of an ordeal, the most trying of our time, and perhaps of all time, and in my judgment any policy of compromise or any timidity in asserting our rights, any policy less than absolutely firm, will lead hastily to national degradation, and from national degradation to war, for there comes a time when the American people will no longer submit to these things and will take the matter practically in their own hands, as they did on the occasion of the blowing up of the Maine. I therefore believe that it was the proper thing for the Senate of the United States, after full and fair discussion, and after a presentation of the question, the integrity of which could not be questioned, to have gone on record to the effect that at this time, at least, while we are practically, as it were, under fire in a sense, we will neither temporize nor compromise with that which we have contended for through this century and more than a quarter while we have been a Nation. I think furthermore it is a valuable right, a substantial right, and that its surrender would involve national prestige and honor.

Indeed, Mr. President, firmness and decision will more often prevent war than bring on war. The opposite policy has time and time again led to a very different result from that which it was anticipated would be the result. I am one who believes that it was the firmness, the quick decision, the positiveness of Jackson in the thirties which prevented civil war. It was the timidity, the compromising attitude, the disposition of Buchanan to write theses on the Constitution when he should have acted which aggravated and helped to bring on the Civil War more than any other one thing in the sixties.

I believe, furthermore, that if Sir Edward Grey had answered positively and definitely the question of the President of the French Republic, when he was asked in the last days of July, 1914, what he would do in case Germany invaded Belgium, in all probability this war would not have been begun. But when the President of the French Republic presented the question to Sir Edward Grey as to what would be the attitude of the British Empire, instead of answering positively and decisively as one who knew the right and was willing to support it, he stated to the President of the great French Republic that we will have to wait and see where the interests of the British Government lie, and I quote almost his language. It is always unfortunate in a crisis to have a man wanting in decision and courage, wanting in the genius for responsibility.

I believe, Mr. President, furthermore, that if at the beginning of our difficulty with Mexico, even under the former administration, when our citizens were murdered, instead of compromising or hesitating or, as it were, almost apologizing, we had said "We want no trouble with Mexico, but one thing is beyond dispute, that the American Republic, true to its ancient traditions, will protect American life wherever it is in jeopardy," instead of having 300 Americans murdered in Mexico, the difficulty would have been greatly lessened, if not wholly avoided, so far as American rights were or are involved. That policy was continued under this administration, and humiliation for the Nation is the harvest of this betrayal of American rights at a critical moment.

In 1887 a lieutenant from the Mexican Army pursued a Mexican girl across the border into the United States, seized her, and dragged her back across the line. The great Democrat Grover Cleveland was then President of the United States. She was a Mexican girl, but she was on American territory, and he sent the Army to the border, with instructions that it should go, if necessary, to the City of Mexico to seize the man who had violated the integrity of American territory. The result of it was that this lieutenant was given over at once and was incarcerated in the penitentiary for 20 years. That decisive act upon the part of that great Democrat established order upon the border of Mexico for a decade to follow. That was something, sir, the Mexican could understand. He had no trouble comprehending the sturdy Americanism of Grover Cleveland.

Decision and firmness in upholding your rights under all circumstances will be respected by all the nations of the earth. But if it leads to war, we have our cause founded in conscience and justice, and therefore doubly armed.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, I am ready and willing for the American Republic to go on record to the effect that Americans have the right to travel upon merchant ships armed for defensive purposes, and that the nation which challenges that right or violates it will be held to a strict accountability. But I was not permitted in any intelligent way to so record myself.

I am always made to doubt the cause in which I am engaged when those around me and with me are unwilling to debate it. I think the most manifest evidence of a great and righteous cause is the willingness and determination of those who are advocating it to state their reasons and their views and their convictions to the world, and let the white light of public opinion test their integrity. I am made to doubt a cause which must be decided in secret, or if not decided in secret decided by some ulterior power without the Chamber of this Senate, and here driven through like we would drive through a questionable resolution in a political precinct committee. It casts reflection upon our position, it enshrouds our cause with doubt, when, having been challenged to speak in craven silence, we perfunctorily record our vote and slink away.

I was not permitted to vote upon the question. We denounce Germany because we do not like her system of government, we say, and her militarism. We are told that in that marvelous nation all power and action proceeds from the royal nod. The great Senate of the United States, the pride of Hamilton, the creation of the best thought and the best conception of the fathers—a body which has given to the world time and time again a full justification of the work of its builders—was Germanized to-day. We took precisely the same attitude and followed the same instruction and reached the same results by the same method and process as the highest legislative body of Germany reaches it when the Kaiser directs action from the throne. There was no free, open discussion; there was fear; there was subserviency; there was shrinking from duty.

Suppose, instead of the President saying what he did say in his letter to Mr. POU—that there may be afforded an immediate opportunity for full public discussion—he had advised the working out of some scheme to cut off all expression of view, that a plan should be devised to the effect that a man was to get the floor, and the next man was to get the man who got the floor and cut off all debate, and take a vote upon this important question, in order that he might have the view of the Senate of the United States. Suppose he had set out that proposition in his letter to Mr. POU, what would have been the response coming from every part of the country? It would have been denounced, and the condemnation would have been so fierce, and beat so constantly upon the White House that there would have been another change of view. But what did he say? He said:

> That there may be afforded an immediate opportunity—

For what?

> For full public discussion and action upon them and that all doubts and conjectures may be swept away.

Full public discussion, and yet he sends his men here directed to cut off discussion and prevent all honest, intelligent action.

What will be the worth of this advice to the Chief Magistrate when it reaches him over the telephone? Whose view can he say he has or what opinion will he have by which he will be able to judge of the views of the people as it is made up from the Representatives of the respective States?

I think, Mr. President, that it was most unfortunate to dispose of it as we did. I am not afraid of war if it is necessary to protect American rights. I am not afraid of sacrifices if they are necessary to maintain this Republic. We can not hope to play a part in the great affairs of the world if we are not brave enough to make a sacrifice for our rights. I am not afraid of that condition, but I am afraid of the subserviency, the degradation of the American Senate in the eyes of the American people. This body which has been characterized as the greatest legislative and deliberative body in the world has no further step of humiliation to take. When a great world crisis is on, and not only when the eyes of our hundred million of people were centered upon us but the eyes of hundreds of millions of people throughout the civilized world were centered upon us, we come here and timidly reach a conclusion under the direction of some power beyond the Senate Chamber. I would rather a thousand times that our battleships should be sunk—we could rebuild them—than to have the honor and the independence of this body thus compromised before the nations of the earth. It will no longer be possible, sir, to cry out against the dictation of the superman and the superstate of Germany. It will no longer be possible to boast that this is a conflict between autocracy and democracy, for a more conspicuous example of the absolute breakdown of the democratic spirit you will not be able to cite. It was, I repeat, a sad and sorry way to meet a great situation.

During the delivery of Mr. BORAH's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

After the conclusion of Mr. BORAH's speech,

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I request the indulgence of the Senate for a moment while I pay some heed to the observations just delivered by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. As one of those in the organization of the Senate responsible for the course which has been taken by the majority, I take it that it will not be assumed a conceit on my part if I dare present some of the reasons, which must appear to the mind of any as the legitimate justification, for the course taken in the support of the motion to lay on the table. Mr. President, my very high opinion of the eminent Senator from Idaho, frequently expressed by me on this floor and in other places, is of itself, of course, a sufficient assurance of the very high regard I hold for any views as expressed by him.

The grievance expressed by the Senator is that the Senate of the United States has not permitted the full and unlimited discussion of all the matters which could be comprehended by the spirit and subject of the resolutions, the resolution designated as the Gore resolution and the resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and others cognate to the subject. One would gather from the able Senator's observations that our course in laying the resolutions on the table were an unprecedented proceeding. A casual observer might be induced from the Senator's accusations to impeach this body of having done some unconstitutional thing, of having entered upon a course that has no defense, one without precedent in practice—a course of parliamentary disposition that is without justification in the annals of the procedure of the body, and as one having for its ulterior object the disguising of some motive on the part of the democracy and the hiding of some object on the part of the President.

It is merely to make clear the object of this action of the Democracy and its support that I now tender the observations that I shall now indulge.

Mr. President, in every legislative body there must be rules of procedure. In this body for a hundred years there has been the rule invoked this morning, the privilege to lay on the table a subject matter where it is deemed that the discussion of it would work more injury to the common good than the disposal of the merits through debate. Under the privilege of that rule it was deemed wise by the majority that these resolutions which could give rise at this particular time to a discussion which the majority felt unnecessary and which as shown by the procedure of yesterday and by to-day's proceeding could be misunderstood abroad, would be misapplied everywhere. It was believed by those in charge of the proceedings that it were better, since the spirit of the Senate was well understood to be in harmony with the purpose of the Democracy in opposing the object of the resolution, that we avoid unnecessary discussion and go to the purpose of disposing of the resolution summarily; that by so doing we affirmed the opposition to the object sought. Thus by a ready mode and easy access and well accredited and established precedent, we only did that which our honorable opponents when in the majority in instances too numerous to recite have done in this same body well known to the able Senator and excellent parliamentarian, the Senator from Idaho.

Now, Mr. President, I invite my learned friend's attention to the wisdom of the course. The able Senator says rigor of action, if taken here, were the kind of action which would dispose of difficulties. In that I agree. With that view I accord. The Senator says if there shall be unanimity of and expedition of sure and certain conduct that of itself disposes of all possibility of conflict. It would, says he, end the talk of war and stop the agitation that is fed by vacillation and inaction. Again I indorse the sentiment of the Senator.

The Senator says what is needed here is directness and assurance of assertion, and that from that we would dispose of disputation which might arise dragging on, leading to the license of further discussion, from which there could arise possible danger.

Then, I ask my able friend from Idaho, what more expeditious method could have been adopted to carry out the theory he so wisely advances than the one we secured this morning by promptly, effectively, and immediately acting, by a voice that went out to the country, that the subject matter of this resolution was so disapproved in the Senate as any sentiment of the American Republic that discussion itself was indicted as an affront to the intelligence of America. We took such course in order that we should establish before the world that there was not even doubt enough upon the rectitude of the course of the President on the one hand or the wisdom of the Senate on the other to justify disputation upon the principle announced by him to Germany and the world.

It was upon the very theory urged by the eminent Senator from Idaho, to avoid the complications which he wisely says temerity of conduct or hesitancy of action or prolonged, irrelevant discussion would have inevitably created.

My eminent friend the Senator from Idaho appealed to history, in which events recited by him I rejoin. I assert, Mr. President, that had there been more certitude of conduct on the part of President James Buchanan antedating the Civil War there would doubtless have been avoided that unhappy fratricidal conflict that deluged this Nation in blood and sent the Nation's children, at the hands of their brothers, to their graves, a course that involved the Nation in 50 years of hatred and arraying the manhood and family of the Republic against each other in the house of their fathers.

And now I say to my eminent friend that he omitted one of the real reasons which produced that conflict. It was that when resolutions of every critical and condemnatory nature against the President were tendered in this body clearly in contradiction of every principle of just government, instead of dealing with them firmly, absolutely, and immediately, unnecessary discussions were brought about in this Senate through which insults on the part of eminent leaders of one part of this country were hurled against the other—expression within misconstrued and from without misapplied, and which awoke hatred on the part of our countrymen for each other, and gave rise to the resentment which marched in procession through the streets and roused the vigor of opposition, which finally took the form of vengeance against those in power.

It was this, I may say to the eminent Senator, which brought on the conflict. It was greatly the abusive debate, the exercise of privilege under it on immaterial and irrelevant matter, which, being misunderstood elsewhere, produced the very results that my eminent friend complains will be the result of the lack of rigor and speediness of certain conduct.

I invite his attention to a matter in which many of us here had personal experience, that to which he alluded—the war of 1898 between Spain and the United States. Had the resolutions which were tendered from time to time in the House of Representatives in the controversy between this country and Spain touching affairs of Cuba, which had for their object infringing upon the privilege of William McKinley, the then President of the United States, in his dealings with the diplomatic affairs of this Nation, been treated there as this resolution has been treated here, when it has assumed to intrude itself upon the diplomatic dealings of the President of the United States when wholly within his scope and sole prerogative, there would have been no conflict—no war with Spain.

I inform my honorable friend it was because the resolutions were not tabled when they were on the very face opposing the very spirit of America, but because under the privileges of them, those speaking their views in the House of Representatives and here in the Senate, availed themselves to oppose the right of President McKinley to execute these negotiations up to the point where they should be submitted to the Senate, and under those privileges hurled their anathemas at Spain, impugned the motives of every man who sought to defend the President, charging some in one breath with treachery, others with lack of patriotism, and all with want of wisdom, because of all this there did arise in both bodies that spirit of hostility of one set against the other, and then found expression in a frenzy calling for severe action by America. I was one of the offenders. I was a Member of the House and one of those introducing resolutions. By the course proceeded upon in the Congress of 1898 men were arraigned against each other by virtue of debates on the floors of both Houses, and from this license there grew that feeling that cried out for war, under the assumption that all that was said in these debates was meant by those who spoke it; and from such there was born in America that feeling of retaliation against Spain because of the utterances on the floor of the legislative bodies that wrung from an aroused people demands unnecessary and unjust to all involved.

Then when certain eminent Senators in this body and Representatives in the other hurled their denunciation against Spain and made charges of misconduct, want of patriotism, and treachery on the part of those who sought to defend the President, the country came to the conclusion that there was something wrong, radically wrong, to use the words of the distinguished Senator from Idaho this morning; that there was a subterranean course through which there was being hidden from public view some sinister object or harmful purpose.

Because of that I informed the able Senator there grew in this country a belief that it was necessary for the people to come to the aid of the legislative bodies and rescue them from the thralldom in which it was assumed they were bound, from which they could not rescue themselves in the expression of grievances against Spain.

It was from this that the message then went out from the legislative bodies indicting the resolutions of the other Government, impugning their motives, assailing their patriotism; and then in Cuba came the expressed resentment in the blowing up of the Maine. Then was war.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator recall that the Senate of the United States was very fully informed with reference to all Cuban and Spanish affairs by President Cleveland in his last message before McKinley's inauguration, and that in his first message and in subsequent messages prior to his special message President McKinley informed the Senate of the United States as to every phase of the Cuban and Spanish situation? Is it not a fact that the Senator can recall that time and again, eight times under Cleveland's administration, special messages were sent in here containing documents and reports upon every phase of the American contention? At that time the same course was followed by McKinley. At that time the people were informed through two Presidents in communications to the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I may reply to the Senator from New Mexico categorically. In the first instance, he is wrong. In the second instance, he is wrong. I now reply and say it is true that some, of course, of the proceedings passing between the Governments under the administration of Grover Cleveland and Spain were transmitted to the Senate; but I invite my eminent friend from New Mexico to recall that one of the assaults made upon Grover Cleveland on this floor in the year of 1896, led by eminent Senators of his party, was, among other things, that he withheld from this body the private negotiations transpiring at that time between Spain and the United States. The answer to the accusations was that they had not been completed.

Yet a distinguished Senator on the other side found it agreeable to join with one on the Democratic side, and in these caustic condemnations I now observe the eminent leader of the Republican minority on the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who did the Senate honor with a seat at that time, now sitting before me. He will bear out this observation I make: There came forth a charge against Cleveland, charging him with tyranny, charging him with despotism because he had not gone to the extent that the able Senator would indicate these men had gone in fully informing the Senate of all the preceding matters touching the purely diplomatic negotiations with which they were solely invested by the Constitution.

Now, as to McKinley. In that administration I had the honor to be an insignificant part of that, and I can speak with more knowledge than I can of the other, of which I can only speak through history. I have foreborne to call the names of Senators of past administrations to whom I alluded because they are dead. In this solemn place we still observe those amenities that death enforces sacredly upon all human hearts.

In the McKinley administration, I say to the able Senator from New Mexico, one of the assaults led here on this floor by my predecessor, an eminent Republican, among others, was the charge against him that he was betraying his office, violating his oath, because he would not make manifest the private correspondence that existed at that time between himself and his Government State officials and that of Spain.

It was two comments made in the wildness of debate by a couple of Senators on the floor of this body, I tell the Senator from New Mexico, that caused the report that Señor de Lome, the representative of Spain, had, in response, called McKinley a pig. It was that revelation that caused this country to be inflamed in its natural resentment of an insult against its distinguished Executive; but I have to say—returning to the Senator from Idaho and likewise to the Senator from New Mexico—that if the intimation of the Senator from New Mexico is that the now President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, has failed to inform the Senate of proceedings which the Senate had a right to know, I ask my eminent friend from New Mexico to what proceedings does he allude? If he alludes to the present proceedings between this Government and Germany, my answer is that there are no constitutional obligations upon the President of the United States to transmit to this body the proceedings between himself, as the President of the United States, and the Governments abroad, as they are in the process of proceeding, save under some specific resolution of this body making the request. While he initiates and carries on the diplomatic negotiations vested in him in his Executive capacity he is sovereign until the time comes that such are to be transmitted to this body for its approval or disapproval. He is not called upon by the system of government in vogue and by the doctrines established to inform this body further as proceedings are in process than it shall request. There is no suggestion here that such request has ever been made, or, if made, that it has ever been denied. Therefore the imputation of the eminent Senator from New Mexico, to be drawn by the parallels which he assumes to be present here, was without foundation, as it appears to be unnecessary. I therefore again say to the able Senator from Idaho that if these discussions—irrelevant, unnecessary, vituperative, vicious, and malicious—which were engaged in at the time of and preceding the Spanish-American War had been withheld there would have been thousands of young men living in the glow of life to-day but who now lie in unmarked graves upon the sodden hillsides in many camp grounds of America. There they were reconnoitered and died of fever and disease for want of guard and protection on the part of their own Government, which had hastened to war in the hour of unpreparedness.

There would have been to-day a kindly attitude between Spain and the United States and her South American daughters. There would have been the salvation of millions and millions of money to this country now expended to our loss. There would have been an exemption to us of the complications that have been brought upon us by our possession of the Philippine Islands, involving the Asiatic problem. I say to the able Senator that all of the complications of this day, in my judgment, now irritating the United States would have been saved America had that war with Spain been avoided, for I charge that all that we are now suffering from in this hour of confusion and prospective danger is the direct result of the difficulties into which we were hurled by those precipitous discussions, untimely, unjust, unfair, and destructive of the prospect of peace, which America could have enforced under President McKinley and his benign influence had he been but permitted to do that then by his own party—which the Democracy now asks that Wilson be permitted to do under the leadership of his party—to execute his duty within the Constitution unhampered by those agencies or legislative bodies wherein they are not called upon by law to intrude.

My eminent friend says that here is an exhibition of subserviency on the part of the Senate. Where will the able Senator point as an exhibition of subserviency that the Senate adopts the methods written in the rules for the disposal of business, and that it has obeyed the very injunction he has wisely given forth of rigor, certitude, and certainty of action, without hesitancy, without prolonging it, without vacillation. Subserviency to the President? Why, the Senator says that the President's letter demanded discussion; that we have denied it. This is not subserviency; this is insubordination. Such is not acquiescence; it is disobedience. Where is the subserviency? It is an imaginary existence; it has no being.

Says the able Senator from Idaho, this country, in the event of any crisis, is ready to make any sacrifice. In that I join my eminent friend. That is one of the great virtues of America, that if there shall come upon us at any time the necessity for sacrifice for the welfare of the Republic there is no man bearing the name of American who does not keep step to the tap of the drum and leap to glory under the wave of the flag of his country; but why, Mr. President, bring upon him the necessity of the sacrifice? Unnecessary discussion with the privileges which surround it, with the evils which have followed it, in this body and in another, is the very kind of thing, I say to my eminent friend, which will do more to bring a heated conflict upon this country than all other agencies to which I can invite his attention that would entail that sacrifice. Misunderstood by our own country, misconstrued by the opponents, they will be used as the agencies to indicate hatred and animosity, and will produce the very result which we of all parties are struggling here to avoid.

I say to my eminent friend from Idaho, recognizing him as the able spokesman of his side, that, instead of moving to those things that will cause a sacrifice of lives of American citizens, the sacrifice of all the treasure of American blood, the sacrifice of all the peace of the American country, the sacrifice of the manhood and the womanhood of our land, I pray that there shall be that communion of hearts this day that shall avoid the sacrifice by making some little sacrifice on our own part here in this Senate, before the country. That we may sacrifice partisanship to patriotism; that we may preserve in patriotism the lives of our countrymen and the peace and the honor of America.

Sacrifice! I invoke my honorable friend that he join with us, the Democracy, that we forego unnecessary conflicts upon mere detail and technicality, upon party politics or political expediencies. I ask that we reach the conclusion quickly; that we go to the spirit of the object; and, instead of holding out to our country that something has been done here to-day which hides the truth from American eyes, let us say that in this crisis we sacrificed the privilege of mere debate; that in this crisis we sacrificed the privilege of mere political discussion that could gratify the desire for display of polemics and rhetoric; that in this exigency we deny to ourselves the pleasure of impaling humanity upon our utterances and indicting mankind with our invectives, merely because the opportunity was afforded to do so; and in consideration otherwise for the welfare to follow the sacrifice we turn ourselves about to join with the President of the United States, as our President, to achieve his object; to carry out these negotiations which he has undertaken, without the interference of the Senate at the time when it was not called upon to interrupt him or to obstruct him; and that all, in unanimity with this object in view, to secure peace, maintain honor, and disclose before the world that a united country was behind a valorous and patriotic President, sacrifice all of mere pride and privilege, and write above our effort those splendid sentiments of Daniel Webster, uttered at Bunker Hill:

Our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in my judgment, we are approaching the issues of peace or war. I do not believe in an evasion; I believe in fairly meeting those issues, and meeting them in such a way as the reasons for or against may be given. The action in this body, taken a short time ago, may be parliamentary; it may be justified by the exigencies of the situation; but it is unworthy of this Senate. It smacks so strongly of cowardice and evasion and of shirking responsibility that I am justified in applying to it those words of criticism.

If an issue of this character be raised, involving the welfare of a hundred million people, it is at least, Mr. President, worthy of an open discussion. This is called an "open forum." It is a term of unmeasured sarcasm applied to the proceedings of to-day. Two parliamentary motions are ever recognized as ones to destroy the freedom of debate. No attempt was made this morning, nor would it have been made unduly, to take time upon the floor of this Chamber to discuss the merits or the demerits of the resolution. One motion is the previous question, and the other, which is as restrictive of discussion, is the motion to lay upon the table; one of which closes debate and the other is itself not debatable.

It is not because many Senators upon this floor are so afflicted that I aver I am not suffering from a retention of eloquence. I have occupied but little time and taken less space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the Sixty-fourth Congress. I have arrived at a point in my life, Mr. President, where, if it be merely a matter of making remarks, I prefer to remain in my seat and vote. By the time those who are entitled to seats here have reached the Senate it is presumed that they have passed beyond the academic stage. We are in no need of elementary instruction in civics; and I therefore think that, in the main, on questions relating to legislation, in all probability it is better to vote than it is to talk.

The President made a proper request, in my opinion. I may or may not agree with him upon his duty in relation to our diplomatic affairs with foreign powers, but that is beside this discussion. I do think—and I feel it so deeply that I feel impelled to break in upon the silence which I have hitherto preserved upon this and kindred questions—I do think the President was entitled to the judgment of the Senate upon this question. He was entitled to more than an evasive vote on a motion to table.

I believe the President was right in saying that the opinion of Congress upon questions of great disturbing moment was vital to him in his negotiations with foreign powers.

If he were embarked upon the wrong course and if he had undertaken the negotiation of matters in a way that would not be sustained by Congress, it was his right to know it, and to know it at the earliest possible moment.

Ultimately the way our Chief Executive is traveling leads to but one goal—it will end in war or national humiliation. There is no escape from the end of the way he is traveling.

From the great West and Northwest, along with the far southwestern country along the Mexican border and the Pacific coast, will be drawn a large part of the men who must defend, in the first instance, the Atlantic ports, which will be the first object of a cannonade.

If you think those of us who are away from the Atlantic seaboard towns do not feel, and feel deeply, on this great question, you are nursing a grievous error. I believe that public opinion there is as quick and the public conscience there is as much aroused on this question as it is in the Atlantic States.

So the President was entitled to the opinion of the Senate. That opinion has been denied him by the action here to-day. It makes no difference what our views may be, the President, on his request, is entitled to our views, and is entitled to them promptly and not at a late day, after he has proceeded on his diplomatic destination until he has arrived at the point where diplomacy has ended, where the laws of peace will no longer serve the purpose. He must then submit to the House of Representatives and to the Senate the momentous question of peace or war. If we do not wish him to travel to that ultimate destination, it is our duty to speak now, that he may be forewarned to proceed no longer in that direction.

Mr. President, it has been said a good many times on the floor of this Chamber that for some centuries the law permitted merchantmen to be armed. That is true; and, so long as the question has been raised, it is well that it be discussed. Probably since the days of Grotius and before—because he collected only the principles and precedents of that time—merchantmen were armed, not with heavy armament distinguishing ships of war, but with such weapons and such ammunition as were reasonably required to repel such enemies as they might encounter.

What were those enemies? In every instance a merchantman, going abroad in the time of Grotius and up to a hundred years ago, might encounter pirates in many of the commercial highways of the world. They might encounter, in the absence of shore patrol, at points where they received and discharged merchandise, thieves, either individually or combined. So a merchantman was permitted to carry such defensive armament as was necessary to protect her and her cargo against thieves by land and pirates by sea. This originally was the ground upon which a merchantman was allowed to carry arms. It was a peace armament and in no sense was designed for naval warfare in either defense or offense. It permitted a merchant ship to be and remain a vessel of peace and not of war.

The rules of no two civilized nations in the world are agreed on the extent of that armament. It varies with conditions and with the centuries; it varies with the character of the cargo and the ports of destination; it is controlled by treaties and conventions, by circular letters of the power to which the merchantman belongs or under whose laws it is registered. There is no hard and fast rule fixing the character of the armament of a merchant ship.

If it be mentioned that there are laws governing nations at war and the character of the armament in years past, let me reply that the discussion is academic. All of the discussion on the floor of this Chamber on the character of the armanent of a merchant ship relates to conditions totally unlike the conditions facing the nations now at war. Every rule is based upon certain conditions. When the conditions cease then the rule itself in most cases ceases.

Let me illustrate. At one time an ancient king saw a guard at a desert point. He inquired why the guard was there. He found no man who could give him the desired information. After much inquiry on his return, he found that at one time there had been a tree at that point which had given shelter to a sovereign who had passed that way—one of his predecessors long since gone to his grave. To preserve the tree a guard had been placed at that point to save it from the irreverent hand of the passerby. The tree had long since died. The sovereign and all his generation had passed away and succeeding days had forgotten even the purpose of the guard, but, a good deal like a public office or a public pay roll, the place continued forever. [Laughter.] The reason of the rule had gone long ago, but the rule remained, and the guard at the desert point was still on duty at the same old spot.

These rules, which were framed hundreds of years ago and which are invoked here to justify some of the arguments for arming merchantmen, were based upon conditions which have ceased long ago to exist. They ceased to exist as early as the second day of August, 1914.

At that time an advance division of the German Army crossed the frontiers of Belgium. The convention concluded at the Second Hague Conference was broken at that instant. That was notice to all the world that this convention, neutralizing Belgium and making binding its observance upon the nations which signed through their proper representatives, had been broken. Immediately resulting upon that came the naval warfare out of which this controversy grows.

The first difficulty came in the loss of Americans on the Lusitania. Following that came diplomatic note after note. The President has striven earnestly and patriotically to conduct the negotiations in such a way as to preserve peace at home and give us safety abroad. I think no just criticism can be made of his diplomatic efforts. They were nonpolitical efforts on his part; it is a nonpolitical view on my part that I take when I approach the examination of these subjects.

For the first time in the history of human warfare submarines have been used; for the first time air craft have become powerful instruments in deciding the fate of nations; for the first time the question has arisen, How shall a submarine make its attack, be defended against, or how shall it be destroyed? A submarine is not a heavy, armored vessel; its sides are subject to attack; it is the most vulnerable of all seagoing craft.

I have no sympathy whatever with the use of a submarine against an ocean liner filled with passengers—men, women, and children—without warning, if it be a craft carrying nothing but its merchant characteristics. I do not think an attack upon such a vessel is justified either by the law of nations or by the law of humanity.

That question, however much it may be intruded, is not the question now presented to the Senate for solution. The question we have to decide, under the changed conditions, with pirates gone, with shore thieves away from the harbors, with an efficient patrol, with police authority, with all that is needed, either at the initial point of shipment or at the destination, of guards to preserve the rights of property, is whether the reasons have ceased to exist. I think they have. Ordnance is not required to quell a mutiny. It can have now but one purpose.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator whether British merchantmen have been torpedoed by German submarines, and, if so, whether the vessels were unarmed at the time they were torpedoed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of them have been. The Lusitania was practically unarmed.

Mr. HUSTING. Does not the Senator think that merchantmen should be permitted to arm themselves to repel unlawful attacks by submarines?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that not by "yes" or "no," but, Mr. President, I will answer it by saying between the belligerents they can settle that for themselves.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that a merchant ship may arm itself in any way it sees fit, either within the circular letter that has been mentioned in some of the correspondence or in any other way. I may at some proper time discuss that at length. It does not now bear upon the question. The question here is not whether the merchantman may arm itself, but after it has armed itself, thereby converting itself into a fighting ship, shall we permit American citizens to take passage upon it to the scene of danger?

Mr. HUSTING. My question was directed to the Senator because the Senator made the statement that the reasons for arming merchantmen had gone by with the passing of the pirates.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have.

Mr. HUSTING. In this warfare——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. In this warfare, however, these unlawful attacks on merchantmen were resumed by the submarine. That is true, is it not? I say, was not the reason for arming them renewed when the submarine torpedoed merchantmen that were not armed?

Mr. SHERMAN. If they are unarmed, there is no justification.

Mr. HUSTING. But they have been torpedoed unarmed, have they not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTING. My question, therefore, is whether the reason has not been revived by these unlawful acts of the submarine, so that a merchantman not only is justified in arming itself, but it is its duty to do so?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it has not been revived, Mr. President—not by any means.

The submarine is an arm of a belligerent's naval force. If a merchantman arm itself to destroy a submarine it loses its innocent character and becomes an auxiliary naval craft. It is then subject to the hazards of naval war. How belligerents conduct a war between themselves does not concern us sufficiently to intervene by force to impose our methods of war or views of international law on other nations. A submarine is a recognized instrument of war. Differences exist on how it shall be used. Prudence requires our citizens not to expose their lives and demand we go to war to restrict the use of submarines as we think proper.

Mr. HUSTING. Just one more question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTING. Would the Senator say that a merchantman that might be exposed to these attacks should not be in a position, if it were unlawfully attacked, to defend itself?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. It may if it wishes to assume the relations of an auxiliary naval vessel to the belligerent power to which it is accredited. It arms itself at the risk of having changed its character from a peaceful merchantman to a part of its nation's naval power.

Mr. HUSTING. I understood that the Senator's argument a little while ago was that in the olden time the merchantman was privileged to arm itself and still maintain its status as a merchantman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct. Because the pirate does not exist except in literature and polite fiction, and because the conditions have changed so that no armament is necessary, there is now no reason why the armament should continue as a defensive measure to a peaceful merchant ship. If it be there at all, it must be not only for the purpose of defense against any ship, part of a belligerent's navy, which comes that way, but more especially for use against a submarine. It therefore assumes the characteristics of a naval auxiliary. Although a noncommissioned vessel, it is as much a warship upon the open sea as a battleship or any other commissioned vessel that is accredited to the naval power under which the private merchantman is registered. That is the very substance of the contention in this case. If an armament be carried, it becomes a ship of war on which no American ought to take passage.

I wish now particularly to call attention to some matters that I think are material in this controversy.

To summarize what I have said—and I wish to be as brief as I can—the conditions have changed that require or justify a merchantman to arm itself. It no longer has a right to carry, because of the reasons as of old, an armament. If it arms itself now, it arms because it intends to make war upon the naval forces of the enemy. If that be the motive with which a merchantman is armed, then it must accept the fortunes of war. If it be attacked by any kind of craft belonging to the belligerent power, it must take whatever destructive effort is made against it.

I am not endeavoring to justify, and do not, the use of a submarine against an unarmed, unresisting merchant ship. I am insisting no prudent American will hazard his life and entangle his Government in war on such a ship.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. HUSTING. If the merchant ship had no defensive armament of guns, and it were unlawfully attacked by a submarine, what would the Senator suggest that it might do to defend itself?

Mr. SHERMAN. It can do like any other of the private craft that belong to the belligerent power—escape if it can or submit to capture or destruction.

Mr. HUSTING. Supposing the case that the vessel had not been asked to stop; that it had been attacked by a submarine without warning and a torpedo fired at it?

Mr. SHERMAN. If it be an unarmed merchantman, if it be torpedoed without warning by a submarine it is a lawless procedure.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; but the ship goes down without being able to defend itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. That is one of the misfortunes of war and of the use of this instrument for the purpose of waging war.

Let me go further. There exists yet—it never has been questioned, and the reason still exists for employing the rule—the right of visit and search to ascertain the character of the vessel, whether it be armed or unarmed, whether it be warlike or neutral, whether it carry contraband or noncontraband as its cargo. If a submarine torpedo it without notice and without searching to find the character of the vessel by visiting and ascertaining its character, if the submarine should be mistaken, and it is an unarmed merchantman carrying nothing that could be in the nature of armament that could destroy a submarine, the submarine has acted lawlessly. It proceeds in every instance at its peril.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; but how about the men——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regrets to inform the Senator from Wisconsin that for the preservation of the rules, it is wiser to address the Chair, so that the Chair may protect the Senator's interruption.

Mr. HUSTING. I thank the Chair. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. But how about the men aboard the ship, who have nothing with which to defend themselves from an unlawful attack?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a matter to be settled between the two nations concerned.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, does not the Senator think, therefore, that a merchantman that might encounter an unlawful attack by submarines is justified in having on board defensive guns, to be used only in the event that it is unjustly and unlawfully attacked?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not. If it be an unarmed merchant ship, it is an unjustified attack. The submarine attacks at its peril if it destroys without visitation and search in order to ascertain what the true condition is. It arms itself not to destroy pirates, but a regular vessel of an enemy navy. How can it do so and preserve its peaceable character so as to justify our permitting our citizens on board?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, just one more question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTING. Does not the Senator think that the mere presence of guns on board a ship is not of itself sufficient to give that ship the character of an auxiliary cruiser? Is it not rather a question of the intent with which these guns are to be used, or the orders given to the captain of the boat as to what he shall do with those guns?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. It is all a matter of evidence; and that, as I will explain later on, is one of the reasons why some proper action ought to be taken by this body.

Mr. HUSTING. Does not the Senator differentiate between a merchantman that is armed with guns, carrying a captain and crew who are ordered to shoot on sight, and one that carries guns merely for the purpose of defending itself from an unjust and unlawful attack?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difference between a revolver for defensive purposes and one for offensive purposes. It is the same caliber, handled in the same way, and produces the same results.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTING. Taking the Senator's illustration of a man with a gun, does the Senator see no difference between the rights of a man carrying a gun on the street for defensive purposes and a man carrying a gun who goes out and threatens that he will shoot his enemy on sight?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difference in his motive. In the one instance he has a specific assailant in mind, and in the other he is sailing under general orders. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the occupants of the galleries that one of the rules of the Senate is that they shall not manifest approval or dissent. The Chair begs the occupants of the galleries to adhere to this rule, in order that he may not be called upon to empty the galleries.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, can not the Senator conceive of a man carrying a gun for defensive purposes, without any orders at all?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not permitted by the laws of most States. There may be certain places on the fringes of civilization where a gun is part of the ordinary pocket hardware of a gentleman.

Mr. HUSTING. That is in the case of concealed weapons.

Mr. SHERMAN. But in all the jurisdictions of which I have any detailed knowledge it is unlawful to carry a revolver, unless it be exposed, for any purpose, whether defensive or offensive.

Mr. HUSTING. I am referring not to concealed weapons, but to weapons carried on the person.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not make any difference, if we extend it and apply it to an armed merchant vessel, whether the purpose is to use it against a submarine or to use it generally against any enemy that may appear.

The very question raised by the Senator from Wisconsin is evidence of the fact that there is substantial ground for controversy on the right of a merchant ship to be armed and to what extent it may be armed. The question, therefore, that presents itself to Congress, and on which the President, as I think very properly, asked for an expression of opinion, was whether, in the exercise of common prudence, we would safeguard our citizens by forbidding them to take passage in such a boat.

Let me read, Mr. President, some matters that I desire to incorporate in the RECORD that will make plainer my meaning in this particular.

It is a question of safety. It is a question of preserving our own people. If I am correct in saying that the conditions authorizing a merchantman to carry an armament have changed, and that no reason exists now outside of warlike reasons for carrying armament to be used against the enemy, then if a ship arms itself it may use the armament for offensive purposes as well as defensive purposes. At any time a belligerent craft approaches it it may be used to destroy the enemy.

If it be considered for a moment what the effect is on our own people and on our difficulties with other powers in which this will involve us, it is very material to find out what we had better do. If the President desires to know if Congress is or is not in accord with him on this question, it becomes the duty of the Senate and of the House to inform him now, so that if need be he may with honor retrace his steps in the diplomatic efforts hereafter made for the settlement of these vexed questions.

On the 13th day of January, 1916, the White Star liner Adriatic sailed from New York for Liverpool. She had on board 120 passengers, some of whom were Americans. She had on board 18,000 tons of war munitions. She was a floating arsenal. She was filled with implements of destruction. She was a potential explosion charged with sudden death to all on board. She was a constant invitation to the submarines or other fighting craft of the central powers to attack and destroy her. The very ammunition that is to-day defending Verdun, that is nerving those who are behind the fortifications to continue in their defense, went on the Adriatic. It has been carried from the coast, and to-day is helping decide the fate of France.

Some Americans were booked for passage on this boat. Are they not incurring an imminent danger?

The White Star liner Adriatic is operated by a corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain. If my memory is correct, there are 15 members of the board of directors, 11 of whom are Americans and 4 of whom are British subjects.

The vessels are registered under the laws of the United Kingdom. They carry the colors of Great Britain. The Adriatic was an armed merchant ship. She carried the usual armament, it is said. The guns were mounted aft. There was, in addition to that, I think, if the exact truth were known, a vastly increased armament for the purpose of meeting any possible submarines that might attack her.

I shall not enter upon an examination of this question of who is right and who is wrong. That is primarily a question between the central powers and the allies. What we are concerned in is to know what we shall do in this crisis.

Here is a further condition that confronts us. Ten days later the news dispatches throughout the country contained the following with a date line of New York, January 23, 1916:

> German submarines are again active off the southwest coast of Ireland. This report was brought in to-day by the White Star liner Cymric.
>
> The morning after leaving Liverpool the Cymric received a wireless from the Admiralty warning her to look out for submarines. An hour later three of the newest British patrol boats hove in sight and convoyed the liner to a point 50 miles west of Fastnet.

Among the passengers was an American aviator and several others, giving their names.

Again, on February 29, 1916, it appears from information sent out by the office of the White Star Line that instructions were received by the Pittsburgh agent of that steamship company not to book any passengers for the White Star liners Lapland, Baltic, and Adriatic, which are to sail from New York between March 8 and March 20.

> The notice advises agents to endeavor to influence persons contemplating voyages to Europe to take passage on American line boats. No reason for the action is known here.
> This is made public at Pittsburgh, Pa.

The latter line in the news dispatch is entirely superfluous in the Senate. Everybody knows what the reason is that led to this change in the business policies of the company.

I cite these merely as instances to show the constant dangers that lurk about a British merchantman on her voyage from any of our ports to those of her own country. The steamship company itself is more concerned for the safety of Americans than we are ourselves.

Here, therefore, is the practical question, Mr. President, whether under these disputed rules and under the undeveloped state of international law applied to changed conditions and these modern implements of warfare we shall undertake to anticipate what future conventions and treaties may do; whether we will undertake now ourselves to write by the sword a new chapter in the international law of civilized nations, to govern the conditions under which submarines may be used and under which neutral passengers may take their passage in a merchantman carrying an armament to repel the attack of a submarine.

Mr. President, if it had not been for the request made by the President, no urgent present need would exist; but he has asked for some expression, and what I am insisting on is that it is proper to give it. The motion to table, which prevailed by a very decisive majority, is not responsive to the President's request. It amounts, to quote from Job, to "the darkening of counsel by words without knowledge."

The President asked our opinion, and was given an empty parliamentary motion. I can see translated into half a dozen tongues across the sea the kind of motion that was made and disposed of in this Chamber this morning. The universal feeling must be, at home or abroad, that we have evaded the question presented to us.

The right of an American citizen to travel under ordinary conditions is unquestioned. He is a neutral and can take passage in a merchantman. I am not attempting to limit the right of an American citizen under proper conditions. There is a difference between having a naked technical right to travel under dangerous conditions and the wisdom or folly of exercising that right, and that is what this question is.

Let me suggest that during a time of riot or great public disorder I have a right to travel on the common highway. It is a place fit for all to travel. It is a public way. I have had the misfortune to be through three riots in my brief experience. I know the difference between the exercise of my right in a time of great public disorder and the exercise of it in a time of peace.

I have the right, when a line of railway in a populous city is crowded with rioters, when an immense multitude of agitated people imagine through a mistaken notion that settlement can be had by disturbing the normal operation of a transportation line. I am somewhat familiar with the conditions that prevail and the immense burden placed upon the police, upon the National Guard, and, in some instances, upon the Regular Army of the United States. Even in time of disorder I have a naked technical right to go down the public streets. It is a highway. My right to travel that highway is not denied.

Shall I wrap about me the cloak of an American citizen and, in the full panoply of my civic pride, go upon a public highway when the air is full of bricks and bullets and the curbstone of the highway flooded with infuriated, rioting men, the basest passions let loose, and destruction rampant on every hand?

Is that a fit time for me to claim my lawful right as a pedestrian to go down the highway and call upon the authorities to protect me?

Have I not a right to call upon the police department to safeguard my passage? Have I not a right that the National Guard of the State shall protect me in the exercise of my desire to travel? Have I not a right to call upon the troops of the Government to safeguard and enforce my right to travel upon the public highway?

Certainly I have, but in every time of public disorder that I know of the innocent bystanders, the pedestrians who have the recklessness to insist upon their right of public travel on a public highway at that time, are invariably told by a policeman to leave the scene of disorder, disperse peacefully to their homes, and remain there until order is again restored.

I ought not insist upon this right, burdening the authorities endeavoring to preserve order, to protect life and property, with my technical right to travel at that time and place. I have no such right, and the Government, local or otherwise, has a right through its peace officers or its military arm or its police force to lay its hands on me and make me return to my home and cease to encumber the scene of disorder with my presence, for two reasons—one, that the officers endeavoring to preserve order shall not be burdened with my protection, and the other is that I myself, if I have not the prudence to protect myself, will be protected by the orders of organized society through its proper agents. It is on that ground it is wise for the noncombatant to absent himself from the scene of hostilities.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I voted to table the resolution and would have voted against the resolution had it come up for a vote. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if this resolution had been passed by Congress, or even a law had been enacted, would it save us from complications in the performance of our duties to our citizens should they sail from some foreign port and their lives be lost?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so. We declare our purpose; we give warning. An American who sails from a foreign port ought to heed that warning. He ought to be as careful of his safety as the White Star Steamship Co., which advises him to travel on a neutral boat.

If there are no more of our citizens destroyed in the future by what it is insisted is the lawless use of submarines, I do not anticipate that either public sentiment or the public authorities of his country would seek to embroil us in the war for what has been done. That is irrevocable. We can not restore. We have no power to resurrect. Unless we wish, therefore, to make our action relate back to what has already been done, making it a cause of war and entangling ourselves in the feuds of dynastic succession, the war of commercial supremacy or territorial aggression, of racial hatred, of family pride; a war of cousins and family quarrels, among those upon whom have descended a crown and who insist upon sitting on a throne—unless we wish to entangle ourselves for what has already been done, if our citizens keep out of this distant danger until peace shall be declared, no more provocation will be presented.

The open sea is our highway, it is true; but the armed ship of a belligerent is a dangerous place any place it is found on the sea. Why should our people insist on being at that particular place?

I believe some proper regulation upon the foreign travel in dangerous places of American citizens is proper, upon the ground I have just stated. In time of international disorder organized society has a right to keep its own citizens out of the danger zone. We need not discuss the question here of the lawful or unlawful use of a submarine, of air craft, and other methods of warfare which might be reprobated by a sense of common humanity. That will be decided in due time, as already suggested.

What we have to decide, however, is whether we are to embarrass ourselves, whether we shall permit our citizens to go into danger zones and be destroyed, as some say, unlawfully, thereby involving us in war, or whether we shall restrain or warn them to desist.

By an order in council of Great Britain all of the territorial waters and shores of Germany were placed in a state of blockade. In a decree of the Imperial German Government from Berlin the Dover Strait, the German Ocean, the Irish Sea, and all the territorial waters of the British Isles were declared to be in a state of blockade, by calling it a danger zone, warning neutral shipping to keep out of those waters. All the difficulties in which we find ourselves involved grew out of the presence of American citizens on merchantmen destroyed by submarines in such waters. That is practically the substance of all our controversy.

My contention is that this Government has the right, and I believe it is its duty in the present crisis, to place some proper restriction upon its citizens, keeping them from going into the danger zone, so that they may avoid the constant cause of quarrel and the possible danger of war. I think the duty of this Government is equal to that of a police officer in a time of riot or great public disturbance, who takes me kindly by the shoulder and advises me to go to my home; that I am in a dangerous place and am adding to the burdens, as I have suggested, of the officers who are trying to preserve the peace or restore order. I put it upon this undoubted right of civil society so to act.

We all have our sympathies. I need not say what mine are. I have them; they are the reverse of what possibly it would appear by my voting on some proper resolution limiting the right of an American to travel upon the armed merchant ship of a belligerent power.

I have studiously refrained from public utterance any place, in the Senate or elsewhere upon the public platform, since this question became acute, saying that I would in all proper ways support the hand of the President in any crisis that came to him, and I say so now. That does not prevent me from voting upon a question that will remove from him the embarrassment and the possible entanglements resulting in war which may be imposed upon us if we do not act.

We are neutrals; we say we are neutrals. The truth is that neutrality is an indefinite term to many people and a very thin line of division exists. The allies possibly have more friends among the Eastern States than they have in the West or Central West or Southwest. I can understand why. Of the many millions of dollars, of the $500,000,000 loan negotiated in this country, of the thousands of millions of dollars of war supplies that have been bought by the allies in our markets, nearly all the money has been expended and supplies purchased, with the exception of one class of merchandise, from Chicago and points east to the Atlantic coast. Outside of horses and mules, coming from the West, Southwest, and Northwest, all the other great export articles of merchandise used in the war have belonged to the quarter I have named.

Are we neutral? We are not. We have not been neutral in a part of the United States. The reason for the rule I now announce remains as sound now as ever. In the purchase of war supplies from a neutral by nations at war we have been justified in the sale by the rules of several hundred years. Any belligerent can buy in our markets under the well-settled rules of international law. They have done so. The fact that one of the powers may not have been able to purchase and deliver does not change the rule. That is a mere question of power.

Add to this rule of the belligerents' right to purchase in a neutral market from the neutral country's citizens anything they need, contraband or noncontraband, or otherwise, the principle that when a neutral market is open to belligerents for the purchase of war supplies it must be opened alike to all the belligerents. There must be no favoritism shown.

I wish to read, Mr. President, matters that are of some moment in my judgment. The estate of Frederick Voss, of Chicago, operates a wire-lathe factory in that city. It is a large purchaser of steel. I have a letter from the Sharon Steel Hoop Co. of Sharon, Pa., dated February 14, 1916. It incloses to the estate of Frederick Voss that operates the metal-lathe factory a form of contract. The letter is addressed to the estate, 1852 Austin Avenue, Chicago:

SHARON STEEL HOOP CO.,
Sharon, Pa., February 14, 1916.

ESTATE OF FREDERICK VOSS.
1852 Austin Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

GENTLEMEN: In order that we may secure the necessary raw material to continue operations necessary to supply you with steel will you please sign and return to us the attached agreement by return mail in the inclosed envelope.

Yours, very truly, SWEM P. KER, President.

Mr. President, bear in mind that we are a neutral nation, that our markets are open for contraband and noncontraband to every belligerent who can come here and pay for what he gets.

Inclosed is this letter, dated February, 1916. It is addressed to the Sharon Steel Hoop Co. This is what the hoop company must sign before they can get steel:

FEBRUARY —, 1916.

SHARON STEEL HOOP CO.,
Sharon, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: We hereby undertake not to export any of the steel purchased by us from you or any article manufactured from such steel to any European country except the United Kingdom, France, Italy, or Russia, and not to export any such steel or products to any countries outside of Europe or Canada without giving written notice to his Brittanic Majesty's consul general at New York of such shipments, and that this engagement will be kept by us so long as the present war in Europe continues.

——— ———.

I read this as a sample letter. It is not the only one in my possession. It is not the only one that can be procured. Those restrictive contracts have been sent out in large numbers for the purpose of limiting the sale of the finished product to any of the belligerents except the allies. If this be not a restriction of our export trade attempted in this country, then I do not know what a violation of the spirit of our antitrust law is.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. What remedy does the Senator suggest for the particular thing of which he has just spoken?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would suggest one of two or both. One is that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations ought to investigate and see if there is any legislative remedy that may be promptly and efficiently applied. The other is to lay it before the Department of Justice with a view of obtaining such proper remedy as the laws of the country at present provide.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think there is any law to-day covering the case?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am disposed to think there is.

Mr. REED. What law?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in restraint of foreign commerce.

Mr. REED. The Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Possibly not. It is possible that that law refers only to interstate trade.

Mr. REED. I am not justifying the practice——

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand.

Mr. REED. I think it a very bad practice, but I was interested in knowing what remedy the Senator thought could be applied. Of course if he suggests new legislation that is a proposition always open.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not very definite as to whether it is a violation of the antitrust law as being commerce between the States. It is commerce in the final analysis between this country and foreign countries, but in view of the particular form in which it is presented in the letter, not the contract, it is the implied threat on the part of the steel hoop company that unless these contracts are signed the Pennsylvania company can sell no more to the Illinois company, which uses their product as its raw material in the manufacture of wire lathes. So, possibly, it is a violation of the trade between the States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. How could it be construed as a combination in restraint of trade unless the Government could go further and show that there was in fact a combination and that the act was simply an act in furtherance of that combination?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not much doubt but that the Sharon Steel Co. is not acting on its own motion. Undoubtedly the steel hoop company is acting because some more powerful combination back of it has given definite directions what to do. The greater part of the raw material used by the steel hoop company is drawn from larger and more far-reaching business concerns.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that with these conditions prevailing it is wise for us to place some restriction on foreign travel. This is especially so since midnight the 29th day of February, when the central powers have notified the world they intend to use submarines without warning on all armed merchant ships.

Either we must do this, or if our people have been so imprudent as to take passage on an armed merchantman, we must be prepared to hold the central powers, to quote the language of a well-known note, to "strict accountability."

What will that be? I do not wish to bandy words. The time undoubtedly is at hand when we must either stop sending notes on strict accountability or, if the act prohibited is perpetrated, we must enforce that accountability by war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator from Illinois think the fact that the use of ships owned by the belligerent nation by American citizens traveling to Europe in any way adds to the commerce or the business of the concern to which he has just referred? In other words, does not the Senator think that one of the reasons why the large business interests of the East to which he referred a moment ago are protesting against the proposition made in the original Gore resolution, is because it will interfere very largely with their commerce?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is not only to save human life. I really think myself that that is of secondary importance, but the presence of Americans on the ship gives governmental protection to the ship, and in that way facilitates the commerce between the manufacturers and the allies.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt whatever but that that is the underlying motive of much of this sentiment in the localities I mentioned a while ago. I do not think their motives will bear vigilant scrutiny. I think if a resolution receives the discussion to which it is entitled in the Senate, instead of being made the subject of a motion to table or a previous question, those underlying motives will be thoroughly brought out into broad daylight. The Senator from Mississippi has undoubtedly uncovered most accurately a powerful reason why so much of the press and certain people oppose restraints on such travel.

I have very reluctantly said what I have said, Mr. President, because in reality if I have sympathies they are with the republican forms of government. England is practically a republic, except that it has a hereditary executive, and France is a republic; and if I have any sympathies, because of being a citizen of a republican form of government, those sympathies are with the allies.

My private sympathies, however, have nothing to do with the wisdom or folly of our course to be pursued here on this or some similar resolution. I am not saying that I am for this specific resolution, but I am for some kind of proper resolution that will limit the travel by foolhardy American citizens in danger zones abroad.

The few hundred who are bound to travel abroad have rights that ought to be subordinated to the rights of a hundred million people to remain at peace. I do not myself want to go to war or to have my neighbors in war simply to safeguard the naked, technical right of somebody who wants to travel to Europe out of curiosity or to make some expected profit on a business enterprise. For my part, I think business could as well stop for a season; we could forego our gain in the countinghouse and in the export trade, rather than that we should have a million of our men in the trenches if we undertook to pursue to its legitimate conclusion this mere right to travel.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I take it, from the remarks of the Senator, that he was probably in hearty accord with the action of the State Department on October 4, 1915, when, in a circular issued in connection with the matter of passports, this language was used:

> The department does not deem it appropriate or advisable to issue passports to persons who contemplate visiting belligerent countries merely for pleasure, recreation, touring, or sight-seeing.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very safe limitation, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator was in hearty accord with that, I take it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in accord not only with that, but I would go further. I do not think the business interests of this country ought to take precedence over human life. The mere matter of a margin of gain for a brief season, if it be a year or five years, ought not to be placed in the balance and weighed for an instant against thousands and hundreds of thousands of our men who might go down to a violent death.

I am in deadly earnest about this. Politics disappear; party lines are obliterated. I am responsible only to my own conscience. No party organization ought rule on this. It is beyond partisan limitations. No party caucus that has ever been called will be able to direct a vote on a subject of this kind. It is a question of our country, not of our party. It is a question of our President and not of our candidate.

It is a question of our preservation of lives and not the counting of blood-bought gold that we may have a little more in the balance of trade when the war shall be closed.

It is the protection of our own people by preventing them from being made a shield to protect the traffic in war munitions. If it be not done, one American passenger on a steamship loaded with many thousand tons of war supplies, like the Adriatic, may secure it from attack by a submarine. It is in effect insuring such a ship and cargo from the perils of war, if the views of the allies are sound. As a neutral power we then cease to be neutral and cast our influence into the hazards of war for the allies. The central powers may not attack such an armed vessel merely because an American on board is put in peril.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some of us have been very severely criticized in the press, and perhaps in other directions, because we had said that we would vote for a resolution asking that our people should be notified of the dangers that would beset them if they took passage on neutral ships that were armed. I have here a couple of brief extracts from one of the leading papers of the neighboring city of Philadelphia, in which the editor says, with unction:

> What a mess a mixture of poltroons, of sympathizers with frightfulness, of men afraid of their own shadows, of those who care nothing for national honor, would make of it, to be sure, if they could ride roughshod over the genuine American sentiment that, fortunately, still exists in Congress.
> Their first action would be to replace the cry of "America first" with "Germany over all."
> Their second should be to haul down the Stars and Stripes and hoist the flag of Germany over the Capitol.

Then, again, under the head of "The most important question of all," the editor says:

> The most important question affecting the United States to-day is this: Do the American people own the Congress of the Nation, or does Ambassador von Bernstorff?

Mr. President, what arrant nonsense that is. I notice the Senator from Illinois made a plea for neutrality, and he suggested, what is true, that the American people are not neutral in their feeling on this great issue. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact, the attention of the Senate to the fact, and the attention of the country to the fact that the agitation that is going on outside of Congress is much better calculated to get us into trouble than anything that has occurred in this Chamber. As an illustration, a great meeting was held in Tremont Temple, Boston, on the 29th day of February, and the heading in the Boston Herald is "Two thousand five hundred cheer plea that United States join allies." It would be interesting if the Senator would read the report of that meeting, which concludes by a resolution, as to which the audience, the paper says, cast reserve aside and cheered it to the echo. That resolution reads:

> We are convinced that our political ideals and our national safety are bound up with the cause of the allies, and that their defeat would mean moral and material disaster to our country.
> Therefore this league is formed to use all lawful means to put this Nation in a position of definite sympathy with the allies and in an equally definite position of moral disapprobation of the purposes and methods of the central Teutonic empires.

Mr. President, what kind of neutrality is that?

Again, Mr. President, there is an organization in the city of New York called the American Rights Committee. The executive committee is composed of 10 distinguished men, one of whom is Mr. Frederic R. Coudert, a man well known to the country. They have issued a declaration of principles, in which they say:

> We condemn the aims of the Teutonic powers, and we denounce as barbarous their methods of warfare.
>
> We believe that the entente allies are engaged in a struggle to prevent the domination of the world by armed force, and are striving to guarantee to the smallest nation its rights to an independent and peaceful existence.
>
> We believe that the progress of civilization and the free development of the principles of democratic government depend upon the success of the entente allies.
> We believe that our duty to humanity and respect for our national honor demand that our Government take appropriate action to place the Nation on record as deeply in sympathy with the efforts of the entente allies to remove the menace of Prussian militarism.

Again I ask, Mr. President, what kind of neutrality is that?

Mr. President, I conclude, as I commenced, by saying that it seems to me that the agitation outside, where men gather 2,500 strong in Tremont Temple openly declaring that we ought to definitely join the allies in their struggle to destroy Germany—because that is what it means—is doing more harm than anything that can possibly come from an open and free discussion of this question in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, the service to humanity would involve the sacrifice of our own people.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I said our service to humanity, as they would have us serve humanity, involves the sacrifice of our own people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Beyond a question; and, Mr. President, in that connection, I wish simply to repeat what I believe I said this morning, that I feel very strongly that the action which the State Department took in refusing passports to American citizens who propose to travel on belligerent ships under certain conditions might well be widened so that the President, if you please, should issue a friendly warning to American men and women that they travel on those ships at their own peril and that the Government of the United States is not bound to become involved in war because of their folly and foolhardiness. Sweden has done this. The President of the United States did it in the case of Mexico. Why should it not be done in the present situation, which is so full of peril to the best interests of our people? It will remove the possibility of war, which we all ought to desire, and I can not see why anybody should oppose the proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I suggest that Great Britain did that in the war between Japan and Russia. She notified her own citizens to that effect.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been asserted and it has also been denied. I do not know as to the definite facts surrounding it. It has been stated in certain quarters, and I have seen a draft of what is said to have been such an order—I have it on my desk—but in consulting with certain other Senators, they have said to me they had reason to believe that that was a fictitious order and was not countenanced by the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course whether Great Britain did it or not does not affect the wisdom of such action on the part of the United States, but I have been advised that it was done. I rather commended the wisdom and prudence of the English Government for doing it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it was done, it was a wise precaution, and certainly we can well adopt it whether we have any precedent for it or not beyond what I have suggested.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has, I think, most opportunely alluded to these editorials and news items.

Mr. GALLINGER. And to public meetings.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and to public meetings. And it becomes a material part of the examination of this question. Of course all the clippings I get which favor the instant burial of such a resolution as that of the Senator from Oklahoma before the amendment was offered are in what I would call, if I were referring to a quarantine, "the infected area." It is the territory in which more millionaires have been created in the last 14 months than have been created in the last 14 years by peaceful industrialism. I think I shall offer a resolution, although it might be regarded as a bit of humor, that in the event of war we ought to conscript all of the belligerent editors east of Pittsburgh. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is again compelled to admonish occupants of the galleries that by the rules of the Senate it is not permissible for them to give evidence of their approval of or dissent from expressions on the floor of the Senate. The Chair requests the galleries to obey the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if there is anybody under heaven who can have an irresponsible brain storm under his cap and think the whole world has gone red, it is some carniverous, bloody-minded editor, who wishes to keep up the traffic in war supplies in order that the profits may still go on.

Editors are an exceedingly useful part of the population, but the Senator from New Hampshire is precisely accurate when he says that such editorials, such inflammatory appeals, such criticism of all who happen to differ from the imperial majesty that sits enthroned under such editorial hats and who thereby incur the penalty of being branded with the opprobrious epithets referred to and read by the Senator from New Hampshire do more harm than any possible discussion in this Chamber could do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. That in that great mass meeting in Tremont Temple a gentleman from the city of Toronto, Canada, declared that those of us who took that position were traitors. He came across the border to say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, we were traitors in 1812, when our Capitol was burned, when millions of men did not spring into being, armed, panoplied, and drilled for defensive war between sunset and sunrise. We were traitors then; we were traitors in the War of the Revolution; and I am perfectly willing to be a traitor again, not to get into war but to keep out of it. I will take my chances with the belligerent editors and with their belligerent allies, both of whom seem to desire our immediate entry into war against Germany.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I am going to say that as to an editor of the character described by him, of course it would be gross flattery to say that he is a slanderer or a liar or anything of that kind; and I do not want to say that, because I do not want to flatter him; but it reminds me of something that I saw a day or two ago from an English author. To paraphrase his language:

> I pity from my soul the unhappy man,
> Compelled by want to prostitute his pen,
> Who must, like politicians, either strive or plead
> And follow, right or wrong, where the guineas lead.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad to have the Muses invoked. I never read much poetry myself, but I am always glad to have somebody quote it. It describes fitly such minds. The Senator's quotations are always apt, and this especially so; and, as what the Senator from Mississippi has recited is very applicable, I thank him for placing it in the RECORD, because it serves "to point a moral and adorn a tale," which I hope will have a peaceable ending.

I trust we will have no sectional division upon this question, Mr. President; but there is a well-established line of demarcation between the aren I have described and the western country. These gentlemen in Tremont Temple, who are asking us to join our forces with the allies, are the ones who are clamoring day and night for preparedness; they are the ones who have bloody nightmares when they slumber, as they think of the guns with a 20-mile range in the Atlantic Ocean; they are the first ones whom troops from the far West would be called on to defend. I am perfectly willing, if we reach that stage of the proceedings, that we do our full part, but I am not willing in a professedly neutral Nation, that gentlemen, whose motives are not above suspicion, to say the least, shall involve us and hurry us along the reckless way that ends in armed collision.

My judgment is, Mr. President, that if a resolution were passed keeping American citizens off of armed merchantmen, the cause of war would be removed. No American right would be abridged. With all due respect to the editorial authorities who sit in judgment on the fate of nations, I think American rights would be as sacred after the passage of such a resolution as before. No great international principle would be violated; no safe ground would be abandoned; no American rights would be lost at home or abroad.

Not many months ago we left the Senate Chamber and went over into the Hall of the House of Representatives and heard a message which concerned Mexico. It said, in substance, to the nearly 60,000 Americans, or such of them as remained in that country at that time, to drop their possessions, take their families and flee for their lives.

Under what conditions did these American citizens go to Mexico? They went there in a time of settled peace, during the 28 years of the Diaz régime. They had settled there with their families and engaged in mercantile enterprises, in stock raising, in fruit raising, in mining and prospecting, and in a hundred legitimate enterprises in that neighboring Republic. They were found there from every State in the Union. Aliens from all over Europe were there. They went there in the pursuit of their legitimate occupations, and were guaranteed the rights of aliens in that country.

So long as Diaz held the seat of power peace prevailed. The Government was a military autocracy. There is no person who ever traveled or lived in Mexico who does not know that it was a Republic only in name; that the standing army was at last the authority which preserved peace, made the laws, and executed them. Under those conditions of peace, under those undoubted guaranties American citizens went to Mexico.

When the message alluded to was read, it advised Americans to leave all they had in that distracted country and return to a safer jurisdiction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield again to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. And Congress made an appropriation to help them to get out of Mexico.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad the Senator added that. Yes; we made an appropriation in order to facilitate their exit from that sorely beset country. I do not care, however, Mr. President, to go further into details as to that; that is a story for another day. Suffice it here to say that the proclamation was sent to our absent countrymen to flee from the civil discord there, and they did so.

In my own State, Mr. President, some of my neighbors returned after a residence in Mexico of more than 25 years. Some brought their families and others left their brothers and sons, whose bones are bleaching on the hillsides and in the mountain passes of old Mexico to-day. I asked the poor boon of trying to get the body of a murdered American, the brother of one of my neighbors, to bring him back and give him burial in the land of his birth, but was denied even that poor privilege by the self-styled government of Mexico which then claimed to have authority in that area.

Now, when we come to the storm-ridden, battle-riven territorial waters of the world—and nobody can say what their extent is, and nobody can tell what international law is as applied to them to-day—when we come to the rights of citizens abroad, we are told by warlike editors, by gentlemen who gather in Tremont Temple, under the shadow of old Faneuil Hall, who have or ought to have as much interest in preserving neutrality as we, that they favor engaging in war in union with the allies, although we call ourselves a neutral people.

Why, Mr. President, if during the time of the Fenian uprising such a meeting of dissatisfied sons of Old Erin had been held across the border, the British lion would have emitted a roar that would have burst the eardrums of all who happened to be within range.

The men who see fit to travel abroad for business or pleasure are by such resolutions to be placed under some restraint. I do not know what the opinions of the Chief Executive may be, and that is not material, for they would not change the convictions of any of us one way or the other; but I wish to inquire if some of the friends of the belligerent editors who go abroad in the most expensive staterooms of an ocean liner, accompanied by a retinue of servants and convoyed by a quartet of bull pups

[laughter], are to be held sacred in traveling in war zones, covered by decrees from Berlin and by orders in council of Great Britain, while the poor, abandoned soul whose family was outraged, whose home was burned, whose property was destroyed, and who himself was slaughtered in Mexico by a lawless banditti, without protest by our Government, is to be forgotten?

If it be improper to warn or restrain our citizens from going into the danger zones of Europe, I ask why did we exercise that guardian care over the people who were warned to leave Mexico?

We warned American citizens, by Executive message, to leave that country, where they had settled during 28 years of peace. They had gone there under the guaranty of a stable form of government. They had some excuse for going; but the person now who sails on an ocean liner knows not where his destination may be—he does not know whether he will land in a hotel or a grave at sea.

When he takes passage on an armed belligerent boat he certainly assumes the risk, and ought not to ask this country to go to war to vindicate his mere naked right to travel abroad for business or for pleasure on a vessel whose status no authority can determine under the changed conditions of modern warfare.

If the merchantman be armed for defense, will she not use her arms against a submarine? When she does so, is it not a naval battle? The fact of the ship carrying an armament is notice to an American passenger he may find himself encircled with the hazards of conflict. Why should he be there? It is conceded a submarine may sink a ship attempting to destroy it, instead of waiting to be sunk itself. If an armed merchantman is exempt from attack when an American is on board, we are asked to insure the traffic in war munitions with the blood of our neutral citizens.

The Senate has been called "an open forum," but when you can not debate a question that involves peace or war, it is time for somebody to inject something that will get under the senatorial bark; and, if it does not get under it here, I hope it will get into the galleries, and from the galleries let it go out into the country. The people of the West, Northwest, and Southwest have some red blood, and they are not interested alone in the profits that may come from traffic with the allies in munitions of war.

I might just as well mention here that I intend to vote against an embargo on war supplies. It is the right of all nations to buy in neutral markets; and, because I believe in that, I shall vote against any restrictions on belligerents buying munitions of war in our markets. I do that, not because I have sympathies one way or the other which I wish to carry out by such conduct, but because the defense of the right of the alien to buy in our markets becomes ultimately the defense of our right to buy in other markets if we are at war.

This is our country. The fathers founded here a Republic dedicated to the principle that all men are free and equal. They made it an asylum for the persecuted of race, creed, and political belief.

Here Gentile and Jew, Protestant and Catholic, meet and worship each at the altar of his ancient faith. Each has covenanted with the other that government shall not regulate religious convictions. Here the fires of persecution are forever quenched in universal tolerance, where church and state are severed that all may be free.

Under the shelter of our country are Slav and Saxon, English and German, Hebrew and Latin. They have gathered beneath our flag to perpetuate and not to destroy it. It represents the best hope of the world.

What of government by the people if it fail? It is a protest against kingcraft and absolutism wherever it rises. It offers a government of law at home against a government of force wherever found. It proclaims to the world to-day that among nations there is a higher law on land and sea than brute force.

It means in the future if war shall blast earth's nations the helpless and the innocent shall not die in its withering breath. It is the world's greatest hope that springs eternal in the human breast that it may blazon the way to the judgment seat of nations, where justice and not armed squadrons will sway the tribunal that becomes the lawgiver of empires in international disputes.

Let the first great lesson make us Americans. May we everlastingly forget our racial origins in the Old World in a new birth of a broader, stronger American freedom in this Republic! There is no Germany here; no allies.

We must be neutral in fact. Only in that neutrality can we justify ourselves in the years to come. Peace can be had with honor, but not with the recklessness implied by those who insist on their right to rush headlong into unnecessary danger.

The need of the country now is not a baptism of blood, but a reconsecration of Americans to the elementary principles of patriotism that will serve us in peace and save us in defensive war. The duty is individual as well as national. Thought and action must be inspired by a constant recurrence and rededication of ourselves in the spirit of those who founded the Republic so it may be transmitted to our successors unimpaired and a fit Government of the greater American race of future years.

Peace at home and safety abroad can be had by a neutrality that is impartial, that keeps it in the spirit, not in the letter alone; that does not seek to make rules for belligerents on conditions heretofore unknown.

In a world at war only by so doing can we have peace with honor or war with justice.

Mr. President, at some later day, if it be thought proper that the condition of international law at present be examined in detail, I am prepared to go into the subject. I forego the pleasure or the duty of doing so this afternoon, because I think it is foreign to the question now pending, not technically before the Senate, but in the mind of every Member of this body.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I was unavoidably absent from the Senate this morning on important business. I think the form in which the vote came up on the so-called Gore resolution was somewhat unfortunate. I personally believe that merchantmen of belligerent nations have a right under the established rules of international law to carry armament for their own defense, and I believe that our own citizens have a right to carry their goods or to take passage upon such ships. I am opposed to the Congress of the United States either advising against or forbidding their doing so, and I regret that the vote was not taken on that precise question. I do not care to go into the subject at any greater length to-day; but I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, following the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and with the permission of the Senate, I shall make some observations with reference to the matter.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in regard to my vote this morning on the motion to lay on the table the resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

At the commencement of this session of Congress the country was so well impressed with the necessity, through conditions growing out of the war in Europe, that preparation should be made for armed defense, that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and the Naval Affairs Committee found themselves busy from day to day, and for the last two months they have been daily engaged in preparing for the better defense of the country. We have met with many difficulties. We continue, and must continue, these sessions in the hope that the land arm of defense, as well as the sea arm of defense, may be perfected, to the extent of making us safe in the event that we should be so unfortunate as to be drawn into the European war or into any other future contest. I take it all of us who have a part here appreciate that we must remain here until this great task is completed.

While these preparations are under way difficulties have arisen, first on the one hand and then on the other, with regard to the parties engaged in this great war. As under the Constitution the mission is given to the Congress to prepare for the defense, so is the mission given to the Executive to solve any friction in a peaceful way, through negotiations and the discussion of issues that arise from day to day out of this war. As that mission has been intrusted to the Executive, and as I am a strong believer in the theory that the safety of this Government depends upon keeping separate the three distinctive branches of government, I have not been willing to permit any action on the part of the legislative branch of the Government to interfere with the constitutional function of the President in trying to protect us from the necessity of using that armament with which we are preparing to defend ourselves in case of necessity.

The resolution of the Senator from Oklahoma was presented, growing out of a crisis with one of the belligerent powers in Europe, out of which great difficulties were presented both to the Executive and to the Secretary of State. The resolution was accepted at once, not only in this country but abroad, by both sides to this European controversy as an attack upon the methods being pursued by the Executive in trying to peacefully solve our difficulties with one of these warring parties; and as the attitude expressed by the Gore resolution became known the power of the Government to carry through by peaceable methods negotiations to compose our differences apparently became paralyzed and the President's arm became weakened, in my judgment, as a result. Thus it devolved upon every patriotic citizen to stand by the President and to strengthen his hand.

Every man knows that I have not been always with the President. I have differed with him on many questions which he thought were of vital interest to this country, and in the other branch of Congress I have not hesitated to make known the differences between the President and myself. Everyone knows that there are disagreements between us now as to questions of policy. Everyone knows that there are probabilities of continued disagreement between us. But where the integrity and the honor of the American Republic is involved there can be no cause of disagreement between two patriotic men desiring to save the country from a conflict and to avoid our engaging in the brutal war that is demoralizing and destroying the civilization of Europe.

So I have felt, and I feel deeply, the question of passing some law or affording some opportunity to prevent men of reckless character, men of a foolhardy nature, placing themselves in an attitude that might result in engaging this Nation in war, despite our efforts and our desires and our prayers not to engage in it. If the opportunity should present itself whereby by congressional action men may be prevented from exercising that sort of privilege the result of which may engage our people in a war out of which we are striving to keep, I would unhesitatingly vote for that proposition. But so long as the present critical condition continues, so long as the President exerts himself and the State Department uses its ability and energy in their efforts to have us escape that disaster, that long do I stand with the President, and that long do I want to cast my vote in this body to permit him to carry out the powers which the Constitution vests in him alone, unhampered by extraneous interference.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, under the rules of general parliamentary law a motion to lay on the table cuts off debate. It will be observed that under the antiquated rules of this venerable body the practical function of a motion to lay on the table is to encourage, promote, and stimulate debate, limited only by the lung power and the physical endurance of the participants.

Those who were so fortunate as to hear the very able, exhaustive, and eloquent speeches on the merits of the Gore resolution after it had been laid upon the table will marvel somewhat at the complaints of those gentlemen that they were denied the privilege of free and fair discussion.

If no important diplomatic negotations had been pending, if no international complications had existed, under conditions normal, or nearly so, I would have voted without hesitation for a resolution requesting the President to warn American travelers against the dangers incident to travel upon armed merchantmen of belligerent nations. My views on this subject are well known, and have been fully expressed. I have said, and I repeat, that I favored such official warning, principally for the protection of the thoughtless and weakminded, who might not appreciate the danger, and to the end that a hundred millions of peaceful and peace-loving people might not be plunged into war as the price of the stupendous folly of a handful of travelers. I had no thought for the personal safety of intelligent men who, out of a spirit of bravado or foolhardiness, or to promote their own selfish interests, would risk their lives on such vessels; for in my judgment such a man, with such a treasonable bent of mind as to be indifferent to the danger of involving his country in war, and wrecking the happiness of hundreds of thousands of American homes, has a life so valueless to his country as to be scarcely worth the saving.

But, sir, the conditions confronting us are not only not normal, but such as have never existed before in the history of the world. Twelve nations, whose inhabitants make up nearly two-thirds of the population of the earth, are engaged in a titanic struggle compared with which all former wars seem but as the play of children. The horrors of this stupendous conflict surpass those of any wars between savage tribes of which we have any account. Every instrument of death and destruction that could be devised by the cunning ingenuity of men skilled in the sciences and trained in the great universities of the world is in use on every battle field. Murderous bombs are dropped out of the air from great flying ships in the nighttime upon towns and villages far removed from the war zone, and sleeping women and little children die as common enemies on the battle field. Underneath the sea creep war craft, armed with instruments and munitions of destruction, and, assailing merchant ships engaged in peaceful commerce, send them with cargo and passengers—noncombatants, men, women, and children—to the bottom of the sea. Poisonous gases are belched out of the mouths of cannon, and men by the thousands perish as insects in a flame.

The boundaries of the war zone have been so extended as to encompass the globe. Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and even Australasia are involved. Every citizen of a neutral nation who goes out upon the sea—the great highway of the world—does so at the risk of his life. Our commerce is censored and regulated by one of the contending nations, and our mails rifled by that nation at will. The right to seize and search our ships is asserted, and with rare audacity a limit is placed upon our exports to other neutral countries. International laws, venerable by reason of centuries of observance, are repudiated and set aside, while the solemn obligations of treaties are contemptuously ignored.

The ark of the covenant containing the remnants of that great body of the law of nations once the pride of all civilized governments is in the keeping of this Republic, and it is for our Government to defend it as the last hope of civilization. Whenever this Nation ceases to observe, respect, and defend this great body of laws, then, indeed, will follow international anarchy and chaos.

The reported casualties of this awful war stagger belief. Sir, the number of men slain in battle exceeds the total number of men enlisted in both the Federal and Confederate Armies at any one time during the great Civil War in America. At Gettysburg, the greatest battle of that war, the total number of men killed on both sides was but a little in excess of 6,000, while the whole number of Union soldiers slain in battle during the whole four years of that war was but 67,000. Forty times that number of human lives have been sacrificed in this awful struggle, and the work of slaughter goes on without sign of abatement.

How Belgium has been despoiled; how the armies of two great contending nations have twice crossed Poland, leaving her completely desolated; how Servia has been despoiled and ruined; how the wail of stricken, homeless, husbandless women and the cries of starving little orphaned children have rent the air of those fated countries is a story too sickening for recital in this presence. The dread spirit of war has well-nigh enveloped the earth. Its shadow already begins to darken this fair land and threaten the happiness and prosperity of this people. It is to stay its course that the President of the United States has for many anxious months given his energies and intellect—the best that is in him. It is to that end that he is now employing all the means at his command—those placed in his hands by the Constitution of his country. To him alone has the power been committed by that instrument to work out our salvation through the channels of diplomacy.

It was under these conditions, as he grappled with this mighty task, that he appealed to the Congress of the Nation, not for sympathy or support—for he must have known that these he had in unlimited degree—but only that obstacles which had been unwittingly placed in his way might be removed that he might not be hampered in his efforts to preserve the peace of the Nation and at the same time to maintain the Nation's honor.

He told us that in the capitals of the countries with the Governments of which he is conducting negotiations the statements are circulated and believed that the representatives of the American people are not in sympathy with his efforts; that he had failed in securing the support of his country; and that the pendency and support of resolutions such as that just disposed of furnished abundant evidence that ours was a divided Nation. Hence, his appeal to Congress for action that would convince the world that he had the sympathy and support of the Congress and that the American Nation was not divided.

When such an appeal was made my mind was quickly made up that whatever my opinion might be as to the duty of American citizens to keep off armed ships of belligerent nations it should never be said of me that in the hour of my country's peril, whether that peril was imminent or threatened, I faltered for an instant in my allegiance to a President who in the exercise of his constitutional powers was thus seeking to preserve our peaceful relations with the distracted and maddened nations engaged in a world war and at the same time to maintain the honor and dignity of this Republic; and so I cast my vote to remove the obstacle that blocked his pathway to the end that he might pursue his course therein unhampered and unembarrassed in the great work before him.

Let us hope that our action here to-day will have a wholesome influence in the capitals of foreign countries where the impression has prevailed that we are a divided people. They will come to know perhaps that we have such divisions as are proper and necessary in a government of and by the people—divisions on questions of economic and administrative policy, divisions which provoke discussions full and frank, often sharp and acrimonious, such discussions as befit free men in a free country—but that when it comes to questions involving the honor and integrity of the American Republic this Nation is as indivisible as the sea. Let them—not one nation, but all of them—understand now once for all that when the President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional powers, in the course of diplomatic negotiations relating to questions affecting American rights and the honor of the Republic, speaks he speaks not for himself, not for his party, but for all the people of his country, who sympathize with him in all his efforts for peace, but who at the same time are prepared to back him in his insistence upon the recognition of American rights and the maintenance of American honor with all the resources of a great nation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the magnificent words and expressions of the Senator who so well leads the other side of the Chamber will, of course, go out to the country, and to the unthinking possibly will offer reasons for the votes cast here to table the resolution to-day. Evidently these expressions have been most carefully prepared, as they have been most eloquently uttered; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that, as appropriate as they would have been, possibly, as explaining his vote upon the resolution which the President of the United States asked us to discuss freely, they may not be so appropriate—unless the Senator can change his mind as a chameleon changes its colors—to the resolution which was laid on the table. The difficulty is that the resolution which was offered here on the 25th day of February was opposite, in its intention and in its every word, to the resolution upon which the Senate acted.

I had not intended, nor do I intend, to undertake a discussion of the merits of the resolution. I am frank to say, sir, that my mind had been made up, from the evidence before me, that my vote should have been cast against the original Gore resolution. But I have been one of those who, from the time I entered this Chamber and took my oath, have stood here and insisted that the greatest function of this body was its informing function rather than its legislative function; that the Senators here owed a duty to the people of the United States to debate, to explain, to consult, to counsel, and finally to act when they understood the subject upon which they had been debating and upon which they finally voted. I want to ask the Senator if he understood what he was voting for?

Mr. President, the Gore resolution was introduced on the 25th day of February. From day to day we sat in continuous legislative session to prevent debate upon the Gore resolution. Not until yesterday afternoon did the Senate adjourn so that, under its rules, the Gore resolution might be taken up for debate. On yesterday afternoon we were informed, in a carefully prepared speech by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that the President had demanded discussion and action upon the Gore resolution. He expressed his desire that we should no longer continue the legislative day, but should adjourn, so that action might be had upon this resolution at once, that it might be discussed, that it might go out to the country, that the people might not be left entirely to the newspapers for information, but might through the informing function of the coordinate branch of the Government understand what Senators were called upon to vote for and what the President of the United States was and had been doing.

Every effort was made to prevent discussion. At the last moment, upon the demand of the President that the Gore resolution should be discussed, action such as I have described was taken.

The Gore resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress, vested as it is with the sole power to declare war, that all persons owing allegiance to the United States should in behalf of their own safety and the vital interest of the United States forbear to exercise the right to travel as passengers upon any armed vessel of any belligerent power, whether such vessel be armed for offensive or defensive purposes; and it is the further sense of the Congress that no passport should be issued or renewed by the Secretary of State, or by anyone acting under him, to be used by any person owing allegiance to the United States for purpose of travel upon any such armed vessel of a belligerent power.

Now, sir, we were informed through our only source of information—the press of the United States—that for weeks, if not for months, the President of the United States has been insisting that he will hold Germany to a strict accountability in the event of the loss of the life of an American citizen sailing upon an armed belligerent ship, and that he considered the Gore resolution not in accordance with his contentions, and therefore that it was an interference with his power, and that he demanded the action and the sentiment of Congress upon it. He wanted to know whether the Congress of the United States was with him, or whether the Congress of the United States stood behind the Gore resolution.

Ah, sir, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee informed us that it was his purpose to seek the sacred precincts of the committee room, and there assiduously to labor in the effort to bring forward a resolution which would reconcile the Congress of the United States and the President; that he himself was not in accord with the sentiments of the President of the United States—he apparently was more nearly in accord with the sentiments expressed in the Gore resolution—but that it should be his aim to attempt to present to the Senate a joint resolution which would meet the desires of all, which would reunite the executive and the legislative branches of this Government, and would show to the world that the United States presented a united front to a common foe.

What did he do? He walked in this morning with a motion, not to discuss but to shut off debate, to table the Gore resolution; and at the last moment the resolution was amended by changing it entirely. It was not the resolution upon which the President demanded discussion and action, but was an entirely different resolution, announcing an entirely contrary doctrine:

Resolved, That the sinking by a German submarine, without notice or warning, of an armed merchant vessel of a public enemy resulting in the death of a citizen of the United States would constitute a just and sufficient cause of war between the United States and the German Empire.

And this is the resolution which was tabled by the Senate! You have sent to the Kaiser, if you have sent anything, notice to the effect that the upper branch of the Congress of the United States will look upon his sinking such vessels, and the death of American citizens, possibly with some degree of regret, but that no action shall be taken against him; that we recognize his right to continue his U-boat warfare, and to send to their watery graves other victims such as those who met their fate when the Lusitania went down!

Ah, Mr. President, the eloquent remarks of the leader upon his side of the Chamber were evidently prepared for another resolution or else he did not read the resolution which was tabled.

As I have said, I have believed, and I have so voted on every occasion which was offered to me, that the informing function of the Congress of the United States was even greater than its legislative function. As I have said, with the light before me, I should have voted against the Gore resolution; but never so long as I remain a Member of this body will I vote to deprive the people of the United States of the only official method left them to ascertain something of their personal, private business.

We are legislating for a democracy, sir. This is not an autocracy nor an empire. The people of the United States commissioned us here to attend to their business, and they are entitled to know not only how we attend to it but the motives which actuate us in casting our votes. We are responsible to the people, or at least I am, and to no man who sits in the White House.

I do not believe in secret diplomacy. In a democracy it is unfitting. The people are entitled to know what is going on. They are entitled, as a matter of fact, to know what is done when the galleries are cleared and the doors closed and we go into secret session, unless it is upon some most important matter then pending, and never are they entitled to be cut off from information as to any matter whatsoever having a present status or any proposition of importance of this kind submitted for their consideration. So long as I remain here, sir, my vote in season and out will be for the people of the United States to be informed and not be compelled to obtain their information purely from the newspapers, great sources of information as they are.

Mr. President, right here I wish leave to quote from an authority I think calculated to sustain the propositions which I have advanced:

[From International Review, August, 1879, vol. 7, p. 147.]

At its highest development, representative government is that form which best enables a free people to govern themselves. The main object of a representative assembly, therefore, should be the discussion of public business. They should legislate as if in the presence of the whole country, because they come under the closest scrutiny and fullest criticism of all the representatives of the country, speaking in open and free debate. Only in such an assembly, only in such an atmosphere of publicity, only by means of such a vast investigating machine can the different sections of a great country learn each other's feelings and interests. It is not enough that the general course of legislation is known to all. Unless during its progress it is subjected to a thorough, even a tediously prolonged, process of public sifting, to the free comment of friend and foe alike, to the ordeal of battle among those upon whose vote its fate depends, an act of open legislation may have its real intent and scope completely concealed by its friends and undiscovered by its enemies, and it may be as fatally mischievous as the darkest measures of an oligarchy or a despot. Nothing can be more obvious than the fact that the very life of free, popular institutions is dependent upon their breathing the bracing air of thorough, exhaustive, and open discussions, or that select congressional committees, whose proceedings must from their very nature be secret, are, as means of legislation, dangerous and unwholesome. Parliaments are forces for freedom; for "talk is persuasion, persuasion is force, the one force which can sway freemen to deeds such as those which have made England what she is"—or our English stock what it is.

The author proceeds to say—and listen, Senators:

Congress is a deliberative body in which there is little real deliberation; a legislature which legislates with no real discussion of its business. Our Government is practically carried on by irresponsible committees. Too few Americans take the trouble to inform themselves as to the methods of congressional management; and as a consequence not many have perceived that almost absolute power has fallen into the hands of men whose irresponsibility prevents the regulation of their conduct by the people from whom they derive their authority.

Mr. President, an irresponsible committee—I would not say an irresponsible committee had not the words been uttered for me—goes to the secrecy of its chamber and reports back a resolution with a motion to table it, and the resolution is changed in its every word and every line and every syllable and every phrase and every meaning, and the motion of the committee is adopted by an overwhelming vote, without discussion and few knowing the message which has been sent by this body to-day by the motion to table to the Kaiser of all Prussia.

The author of this article, Mr. President, is Woodrow Wilson, and it is taken from an article in the International Review, volume 7, page 147. I understand that this Woodrow Wilson is the same Woodrow Wilson who demanded open and free discussion and manly action on the part of this honorable body.

Now, Mr. President, I should close with this were it not that I asked a question of one of the gentlemen upon the other side, who now so gracefully presides over the deliberations of this assembly (Mr. LEWIS in the chair), as to whether it was not a fact that during the Spanish-American War, to which he had referred, the Congress of the United States had been most fully informed of the conduct of affairs—exactly the conditions that were going on—both by Mr. Cleveland and by Mr. McKinley long prior to the blowing up of the Maine. I should close and not refer further to this had it not been for the fact that my question brought an unqualified no. I should then have accepted such an expression from the Senator had it not been that the record does not bear him out. I am not going to read from the messages, but December 6, 1896, Grover Cleveland, then President of the United States, sent to the Congress of the United States a message comprising some 35 pages, 7 pages of which were devoted to a minute detail of the relations between this country and Spain, the conditions in Cuba, and our connection with those conditions and our connection with Spain, detailing what he, as President of the United States, was attempting to do, and closing with the remark—I am not attempting to quote it—that this was the body which must finally act, and it was his duty as President to inform them of the conditions.

Mr. President, this was in December, 1896. Following that in special message after special message, the President of the United States sent detailed information into this body, never hesitating except in one instance wherein he declared that it was not compatible with the public interest, and he followed that message a few days later by another stating that as the matter is now adjudicated he forwarded all the information and papers to this body.

Mr. President, in December, 1897, a year after Mr. Cleveland's message, President McKinley, after his inauguration, sent a message to the Congress of the United States in which he dwelt with much detail upon foreign affairs, and particularly the affairs between this country and Spain, and Cuban affairs and Cuban matters and Cuban conditions, and his efforts in behalf of this country to arrive at an amicable solution of our difficulties with Spain, saying that it was his duty to inform the Congress of the United States as to what the conditions were fully, frankly, and freely. It was not until April 11, 1898, following, that he came with his special message to the Congress detailing the conditions as they then existed, and asking this body to allow him to use the land and naval forces to put an end to those conditions, and he referred only incidentally to the blowing up of the Maine. He gave the reasons in detail.

It was simply a question to the Senator who was then attempting a most eloquent defense of the action of the now President of the United States that the Senator from New Mexico addressed his question, which was unqualifiedly, as I said, answered in the negative. It was only for that reason that the Senator from New Mexico has now sought to call the attention of the Senate to the dates and the details of these matters.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was in hopes that the learned Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] would permit his resolution to remain as he introduced it. It was my desire that we might stand by the flag until it went down, but he saw fit to change it, and the change rendered it impossible for me to vote for it; therefore I voted to table the resolution as amended. I did intend to discuss this question this afternoon. I think the time has arrived when Congress should deal with such matters with the utmost candor, courage, and patriotism. But I am not going to trespass upon the patience of the Senate at this late hour. I have determined not to discuss the measure further until the dam bill, which has engaged the Senate for the last three or four weeks, shall be disposed of. Then I shall treat it, I hope, as the gravity and importance of the problem deserves that it should be treated. A more important question has not engaged the attention of the American Congress since I became a Member of the Senate. The questions at hand not only involve the probability of war between the United States and a foreign country, but a vastly more important issue is presented—the dignity and integrity of the United States Congress.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, at a time like this I realize it is easier to say too much than too little. However, I desire to make a brief explanation of the vote which I cast on the resolution.

I fully concur in the views of the law entertained by the President and by the Senators who have expressed themselves upon it relative to the freedom of the seas, that neutrals have the absolute right to travel upon merchant vessels of belligerents armed for defensive purposes and that it is a direct violation of international law for a belligerent to sink such vessels without sufficient warning to enable the passengers to save their lives. However, I believe that true, loyal American citizens, with due regard for their own safety as well as for the safety of their country, ought not to travel on armed merchant vessels during these perilous times. Indeed, they ought not to risk their own lives and endanger the country by traveling at all if it is possible to avoid it. But I do not believe that any warning from Congress, or from the President, or from any other source, would aid in the least in preventing it. Warnings of all kinds certainly failed to do any good in the case of the Lusitania.

Even if this warning resolution were passed by Congress, the United States could not avoid responsibility, and if a vessel on which its citizens were traveling armed for defensive purposes only should be blown up and American lives were lost we would still have that responsibility. The warning resolution would therefore have resulted in no great good, and if passed under existing conditions it might have resulted in great harm.

The mere fact that such a resolution has been pending has caused a general belief all over the world that there is a great difference of opinion among the American people on this important subject; that they are not united in their stand for American rights and that at least Congress is not behind the President. I do not believe that there is any great division of opinion among the American people, and after the vote taken to-day there can certainly be no further doubt as to the position of this branch of Congress. The result was surely emphatic enough to satisfy the most skeptical.

The President declared that the pendency of the resolution had hampered and is now hampering his diplomatic negotiations. If the mere pendency of the resolution has been harmful, I am sure that its passage would have resulted in greater harm.

I for one will not lay a single straw in the way of the President, who is burdened with this great responsibility at this time. No President since the immortal Lincoln has had to meet such grave responsibilities. Under the Constitution of the United States the President is charged with this particular duty, and it is not for Congress to interfere in any way, or at least to in any way directly or indirectly tie his hands.

If the President had failed, there might have been some reason for such action; but the President has not failed in his duty in this regard. He has been completely and wonderfully successful in all his diplomatic contests with the great nations of the world. He has succeeded in gaining every point of contention and in preserving the rights of the citizens and the honor of the Nation notwithstanding all the numerous and momentous questions that have been raised and considered up to this very time.

He got along all right and to the satisfaction of everybody when Congress was not in session, and if Congress will leave him alone in the exercise of his prerogatives and in the discharge of those duties which the Constitution of the United States specially places in his hands, he will get along all right now.

There is one thing sure, and that is that the people of this country have undoubted faith and implicit confidence in the President, which I regret is more than can always be said of their opinion of Congress. If there is one man in this administration above all others who has measured up to the full requirements of his office in every respect, it has been President Wilson. The people believe in him, and they are behind him, and they want their Representatives in Congress to stand by him. They recognize his great ability and high character, his strict integrity, scrupulous honesty, and his earnest and conscientious desire to do right. He is possessed of the right ideas and the highest ideals. With such a leader none need hesitate to follow.

It is charged that the President is about to lead us into war, when it is within the knowledge of everybody that he has done everything in his power to keep us out of war, and has succeeded, and that this is the main desire of his life. If there is any one thing more than all others that shines out brightest in this administration it is the fact that the President has kept us out of war and at the same time preserved every American right when assailed and the honor and integrity of the Nation. He is the greatest exponent of peace who has ever occupied the White House, and with him handling our foreign affairs, we have the greatest confidence in his ability to preserve peace. I am glad the Senate has given him this magnificent vote of confidence. Under the rules of the Senate the only way to secure an early vote was by motion to table the resolution, and I therefore voted to table it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Kansas finally concludes may I ask him concerning a certain part of his address?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Germany perseveres in her present submarine warfare methods, and the President adheres to his present position, what is the inevitable conclusion in the Senator's mind?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will simply say to the Senator from Illinois that it depends entirely upon whether the rights of American citizens have been invaded. If they have not, certainly this country will have no reason to complain, and it should remain neutral.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to ask the Senator from Kansas another question?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator was through. I do not care to interrupt him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely wanted to propound a further interrogatory to the Senator from Kansas in line with the last one, and then shall conclude. The question of the right of an American citizen to travel on an armed merchantman is in issue. If we adhere to our insistence on that right and Germany adheres to her present method of warfare, resulting in the death of an American citizen, what will the President do?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will answer the question of the Senator from Illinois by saying that, in my judgment, if Congress will let the President alone he will succeed in winning this last point of the controversy as he has every other contention with Germany, and the President will not have to do anything.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. President, why did the President request Congress to take some action?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not share the confidence of the President, but the action of Congress speaks for itself as to the necessity for some decided action such as that which was taken to-day, so that the people of this country and of the world might know that there is at least one branch of Congress which stands behind the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if we have a few more confessions we shall find out really how Senators feel on this important question. [Laughter.] We can not get the correct idea of it, evidently, from their votes. There is a majority one way, so far as the voting record is concerned; but if you will count up the confessions which have been made you will pretty soon find out that the real majority is on the other side. Senators, one after another, get up and say that they are in favor of warning American citizens to keep off the so-called defensively armed merchant vessels, but they vote with the President, who does not agree with them in that idea, but who wants to protect everyone who desires to go on such a ship; and he is opposed to giving any such warning to the people. Evidently some Senators are voting as they fear and not as they feel.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. The Senator means that they think they voted with the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I will give them the benefit of the doubt. Mr. President, it will be a good defense among the constituents at home to circulate a speech, in which the Senator said he was in favor of giving notice to American citizens that they ought not at this time to travel on armed merchantmen, and they can still retain their standing with the man at the head of the "pie counter" by voting the other way.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the illustration given by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], when he described conditions just prior to the Spanish-American War, ought to be reversed, and would in fact be reversed if the proper application were made. The Senator said, in substance, that at that time Congress was a turbulent body, demanding war, while President McKinley, standing out as best he could to preserve peace, was by Congress finally driven into war. The Senator argued, therefore, that this Congress was going to drive the President into war. If Congress passes a resolution asking American citizens to keep off armed merchant vessels, that is just exactly contrary to what the President wants. He does not want any such resolution passed. Hence on this occasion it is Congress that is trying to preserve peace and keep us out of war, and the only danger of such war comes from the policy of the President, when he says he is opposed to giving any such warning, but is going to defend every man who wants to rush out ruthlessly and endanger his own life in such a ship, and thus bring the balance of the country into imminent danger of war.

What would the passage of this resolution mean? Could it be construed as disrespectful to the President? I refer to the Gore resolution in its original form, or what, to me, seems the more appropriate resolution, the McCumber resolution, the effect of which is to warn American citizens, to ask them, while this terrible war is on and this question is yet unsettled and undetermined, but is under negotiation between the President and foreign nations—while that condition is on to save their country trouble and save the probability or the liability of war and to stay off such ships. Can any man say that is any disrespect to the President? If the President has a different idea—and I concede he has a right to it; I would not question his right to hold it—can the President say to Congress, the only branch of the Government that under the Constitution has the right to declare war, "You shall not express your opinion if it conflicts with mine"? In the case put by the Senator from Illinois Congress was crowding the President and the country into war. In this case it is the reverse. The President is leading toward war and Congress is holding back, trying to keep the country at peace. The object of warning our people to keep off of armed vessels is to maintain peace. I fear the course of the President will lead our country into war, and for that reason I want Congress to warn our people to keep off of armed vessels and thus avoid friction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is one phase of the proceedings to-day that interests and somewhat puzzles me. The Gore resolution was at the last moment amended on the suggestion of the author of the resolution. That amendment, which we did not very fully understand when we voted on it, because it was simply read from the desk, states that if an American citizen should lose his life because of a submarine attack it would be a cause for war.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the effect of it—on an armed merchantman.

Mr. GALLINGER. An armed merchantman. The majority voted that resolution down by a very decisive vote. It seems to me that that notifies the Kaiser, a gentleman who is so much talked about, that he can go along and do what he pleases, and it will not be a cause for war.

Mr. NORRIS. That construction may very well be put on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does it not strike the Senator from Nebraska in that way?

Mr. NORRIS. Those who say that a vote to table was a vote on the merits of the question can not put any other construction on it but that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I want to concede that, in my judgment, I would not claim that against anyone, for I voted against tabling the resolution as it was modified, although, if I had had a vote directly on the question itself, I would have voted against the resolution; but the only hope under the parliamentary situation of getting anything at all satisfactory of passing a resolution warning American citizens was to prevent the tabling of that resolution. I voted against tabling the resolution, because only in that way could it be kept before the Senate and thus permit us to vote for the substitute, which was a resolution warning our citizens to keep off of armed vessels.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. Is there not a vast difference between voting to table a resolution and the construction that may be given that vote and a vote against tabling? A vote to table a resolution means that you are opposed to that resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. You may vote against tabling it when you would also be opposed to it, but you desire an opportunity to have it debated and to have an opportunity for amendment. So that a vote to table a resolution may very properly be considered as decisive of the contents of the resolution; but a vote against tabling is not decisive in the same way, because the one casting the vote may be impelled by a desire to have the matter kept open for debate and for amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota has very correctly and properly stated the proposition. I think that is well illustrated in this case. For instance, the parliamentary situation that existed at the time the motion to table was made was this: If the motion to table the resolution had been defeated, then the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] would have been in order, and we would first have had a vote upon the substitution of his resolution for the amended Gore resolution. I should have voted for that. I believe nine-tenths of the Senators of this body, uncoerced and uninfluenced by anybody from any place, high though it may be, would have done the same thing. I have no doubt that the Senate and the House would, by an overwhelming majority, pass a resolution along the lines of the resolution which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] offered as a substitute, and which he has reoffered now, and which will come up in the regular routine to-morrow or on the first new legislative day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator appreciates the import of his words when he speaks of a Senator being coerced or influenced by any other consideration than the good of the most, the proper performance of the functions of his great place, and the welfare of his constituents and of the American people generally? I do not know of a charge, I can not conceive of anything the Senator could say, that is more harmful or derogatory to the reputation of a man who holds a position here as representative of a great State than to say that he is influenced by any power outside of the Senate other than the interests of his constituents. The Senator may be correct in his estimate of the character of some of his colleagues; but if so, God help the American people!

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I will ask the Senator a question: Does the Senator believe that the McCumber resolution, if brought before the Senate, would not receive a large majority of the votes of the Senators if there were no influence brought to bear upon any Senator and if every Senator voted according to the dictates of his own conscience?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, if I should do the immodest thing of judging every Senator by myself, I should say they would vote for that resolution or one similar to it, but I can not say; I would not be so reckless in the use of words, and I would not do my colleagues the injustice to say that they were influenced by orders from anybody. I do not see how a self-respecting Senator would take orders even from the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, no one has asked the Senator to do that; that is for him to decide. I wish the Senator would give a direct answer to my question. It does not mean, Mr. President, when you say that a man takes orders from somewhere that he is not patriotic; that he does not conscientiously believe that that is the best way to serve his country. There are two lines of thought on that question, and I am not charging any man with being unpatriotic. There are noted men of all political parties who believe that party solidarity is always desirable above everything else and that when their party leader speaks they must obey. Many great men have advocated that. It is held that through a caucus, or some other means, one should surrender his individual convictions for the good of those in control of the party. I do not believe in that system. I think it is not only wrong but that it is vicious. I am not criticizing the man who believes in that method of legislation, but the only effect of it is that you often vote for something that you are opposed to, and you often vote against something of which you are in favor. It does preserve party solidarity, and incidentally those who follow it never have any trouble when the "plum tree" gets a good shake; but those who do not follow that procedure usually get into trouble when the political harvest comes.

Mr. President, it is the duty of our Government to maintain strict neutrality in the great conflict now going on in Europe. If we do this, we must not attempt to change international law while the conflict is on. International law has always recognized the right of citizens of a neutral country to sell arms and ammunition to belligerent nations engaged in war. This right has not only been recognized, but it has been practiced by Germany, England, and France in many of the wars of the past. I believe, therefore, that if we laid an embargo upon arms and ammunition while the war was raging it would be changing the rule of international law and would in effect be an unneutral act.

Notwithstanding this rule of international law, we have a right to regulate the carrying of passengers in interstate and foreign commerce. We can prevent, by law, any ship leaving any American port from carrying passengers if she has her hold filled up with explosives and munitions of war. In my judgment, such a law ought to be passed and ought to be passed at once. That would in no way interfere with the right of a vessel to carry munitions of war, but it would prevent her from carrying passengers at the same time. We already have a law that prevents railroad companies from carrying dynamite and passengers on the same train. Why should we not pass a law that would prevent ships, whether they are American ships or foreign ships, leaving any of our ports, either in war or in peace, from loading one part of the ship with high explosives and the other part with human beings?

Upon the question of the right of merchant vessels to carry arms for defensive purposes, international law is equally clear. This law had its origin in the days of piracy, and while the reason for the law has long since disappeared, the law itself still remains, unreasonable as it may seem, and at the beginning of this conflict was recognized by all the leading nations now engaged in the conflict. This law, in my judgment, is illogical and unreasonable and I think it is entirely wrong. But illogical as it is, it is still international law and had the approval of both England and Germany at the beginning of this war. If we remain absolutely neutral we can not change this rule any more than any other recognized international law, but again, we have the unquestioned right to pass any law we may see fit for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and while we could not, without the violation of international law, prohibit such an armed passenger vessel from clearing our ports, we do have the acknowledged right to see that any such vessel, whether it be an American vessel or a foreign vessel, leaving an American port shall not carry passengers if at the same time she is armed for so-called defensive purposes. The Gore concurrent resolution has been introduced, the object of which is to warn people not to travel on such vessels. Such a resolution, if passed, could have only a moral effect. While this might accomplish much good, the real remedy for the situation would be a law such as I have indicated. At the beginning of the conflict Germany claimed the right to sink without warning merchant vessels sailing under the flag of any of her enemies. In this way she sank the Lusitania and other ships. I have never excused these acts. They were not only contrary to international law but they were inhuman and barbarous. After extended diplomatic negotiations with our Government, Germany agreed not to destroy such vessels without warning, unless they were armed. Therefore, if unarmed passenger vessels are in no danger of attack without warning and without having the lives of their passengers cared for and protected, I can see no reason why they should want to carry arms for so-called defensive purposes when the only effect of carrying such arms will be to invite an attack without warning, which would not be made if they did not have the arms. In other words, it is claimed that they want to arm for defensive purposes, for protection from an attack that will not take place if they do not arm. This seems to me to be an illogical and unreasonable proposition. They do not want to be attacked without warning. They will not be attacked without warning if they do not arm themselves. The only object of arming themselves is to prevent that attack. If they are sincere in a desire to prevent such an attack, and the guns are in reality for defensive purposes only, then they ought to disarm and thus prevent the very attack that it is claimed they desire to avoid.

In conclusion, my position is: That the prohibition against the selling of munitions of war by our citizens to a belligerent Government and the prohibition of a passenger vessel armed for defensive purposes from leaving our ports would each be an attempt on our part to change international law during the existence of actual war and would therefore be in effect an unneutral act. We do have the right to prohibit ships flying any flag leaving our ports if they carry munitions of war and explosives, or if they are so armed, from carrying passengers. I think we ought to pass that kind of a law and we ought to pass it without any delay. We have already provided by law that all ships leaving our ports and carrying passengers must take certain precautions in the way of lifeboats and various other requirements. These laws were passed in the interest of humanity and to save human life, and in the interest of the same humanity we ought to prohibit by law such ships from taking any passengers from American ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, is the Senator informed as to whether or not there is a regulation forbidding the carrying of passengers on boats on the Yukon River that carry explosives of any kind?

Mr. NORRIS. I have been told that there is such a law in Alaska. Personally, I do not know. I only have it from information that I think is reliable; but I may be mistaken about it.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there are in this body two methods of preventing the discussion of a proposal upon which a vote is asked. The first is by moving to lay it on the table. We had an example of that method this morning, when a proposal was made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], which was unknown, I assume, to every Member of the Senate save himself, which when read was not heard by half the Members of the Senate and which was understood by still fewer numbers of this body. Nevertheless, upon a motion that it lie on the table, 68 Members of the Senate voted in the affirmative without any real knowledge of the effect of what they were doing.

I do not intend to explain my vote upon that resolution further than to say that it was a protest against the most indefensible and outrageous suppression of the right of debate and the opportunity of intelligent consideration I have ever seen, and I was not willing to add my vote to the number who were willing to take that leap into the dark.

The second way of preventing real discussion of an amendment or a proposal is to absent one's self from the Senate Chamber. An example of that method may be found, I think, in the way in which the Members of the Senate have treated the amendment which I have offered to the long-forgotten bill now and for the last few hours technically under consideration. In view of that situation I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hughes	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Stone
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Pittman	Thompson
Colt	Kern	Pomerene	Tillman
Cummins	La Follette	Shafroth	Vardaman
du Pont	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Lewis	Sherman	Walsh
Gore	McCumber	Shields	Warren
Harding	McLean	Simmons
Hitchcock	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. WALSH. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] are absent from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, what is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That if in the operation of the property for which, under the foregoing provision, the United States is required to pay it shall appear that it has earned during the period of use by the grantee, or his assignee or successor, a surplus over and above cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation of that part of the property valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, taxes and other fixed charges, including bonded indebtedness and such reasonable return upon the remainder of the capital invested, not including investment from earnings, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, then the amount of such surplus shall be deducted from the aggregate of the fair value and original cost as above ascertained, and the United States shall be required to pay only the balance so resulting: Provided further, That in order to facilitate the ascertainment of the amount of such surplus to be so deducted the Secretary of War is authorized to require from the grantee, his assignee or successor, such annual reports as will set forth the information material to such inquiry and ascertainment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and I understand he has not voted. I am informed that he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Accordingly I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. He being absent and I not knowing how he would vote upon this proposition, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I observe that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FALL. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I should like to inquire whether he has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. FALL. I refrain from voting. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. I understand that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, if present would vote as I would. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH. I will transfer my pair heretofore announced to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY];

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON];

The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND];

My colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT];

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. CUMMINS's amendment on the table.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to debate this amendment, but simply to state the effect it would have upon the pending bill. The bill is for the purpose of improving navigable rivers and utilizing the water power created by dams constructed for that purpose.

The bill provides that the electric energy and other products of the water power shall be subject to regulation by the State public-service commission where it is sold in intrastate commerce and by the Interstate Commerce Commission when it enters into interstate commerce.

The bill further contemplates that the developments shall generally be made by corporations and costing from a million to $50,000,000, which have to be raised by the issue of bonds.

This amendment proposes that after the expiration of a permit for the term of 50 years the Secretary of War may review the action of the State public-service commission, which usually consists of three or five members, and that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, composed of seven members, fixing the rates of these companies for electric energy; and in the event he finds those commissioners have allowed the company to charge excessive rates, the same shall be deducted from the value of the property when taken over by the United States, this deduction to be allowed although there might have been numerous changes in the ownership of the stock during the existence of the permit and without regard to the rights of the bondholders, who, of course, have no voice in fixing the rates and do not receive the dividends.

This is to be done by one man—the Secretary of War. He is, by this amendment, authorized to do this after the lapse, it may be, of 40 years.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment is impracticable and would do the stockholders who are owners of the property at the time of the final settlement of its affairs and the bondholders great injustice, and that its effect would be to absolutely deter all investment under the bill and defeat the purposes for which it was introduced.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that those who favor this bill, if they have faith in the arguments that they have made, which have prevailed in the Senate from the beginning of the discussion down to now; if they believe that the regulation which they have said from time to time would apply, ought not to oppose this amendment. Those of us who have favored changes in the bill have advocated various amendments, the effect of which in most instances as we think would give some regulatory power to the Secretary of War. Those motions to amend have been debated and discussed. As a rule they have been opposed by those who have charge of the bill, and they have been successful in almost every test. All the motions that have been made having in view the regulatory power in the hands of the Secretary of War have been defeated.

Many of us argued that we ought at least to give the Secretary of War the right to charge an annual fee or a charge based upon the development of the power. I am not going over that argument, but it is the belief of those who favored that amendment that in many cases it would bring into the Treasury of the United States a great deal of money; in other cases it would have the effect of regulating the price which the consumer had to pay. Those of us who favored such amendments were advocating them always upon one or the other of those theories, believing in the end that it would redound to the benefit of the consumer and prevent monopoly and extortion. We were always met with the argument that the public-service commission of the various States and in some instances the Interstate Commerce Commission would have power to regulate, and the Senate followed those who thus believed and defeated us in almost every case.

Now, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offers an amendment the effect of which is that if it should happen that what you have said will not always prevail and that there would be cases where regulation did not have the proper effect, or had no effect, and that through the granting of this franchise during the 50-year period the grantee should make an immense amount of money in excess of a reasonable income for his efforts and his investment—in other words, the amendment says if in any case you should have been wrong and we right, we would then give to the Secretary of War at the end of the 50-year period the right to demand credit for the excessive profits, if there were any. If your theories are true, there will be none. If the bill works out as you have said it would, this amendment will have no effect whatever. If the men who get these privileges and these rights get only a reasonable return upon their efforts and upon their investment, there will be nothing to be taken over or applied by virtue of placing this amendment in the law. But if you should be mistaken, and if some of the rest of us have been right, then at the end of the 50-year period, if the Government decided to take over the property, they will not have to pay, or, in other words, the Government will get credit for those excessive profits.

If a man, for instance, has built a dam in a stream and has made a reasonable interest upon his investment, paid all his expenses, has received a remunerative income from every effort and every dollar expended, and in addition to that, let us say in a plant that cost a million dollars, he has in the 50-year period made $5,000,000 in addition to those costs and legitimate profits, then the people who paid the rates have not only paid a reasonable rate for what they received, but they have paid a rate sufficiently high and exorbitant by which that excess has several times paid the value of the property itself to the man who constructed it. The people have paid it, and if they have paid for it once and the Government wants to take it over again, why should they be required to pay it again? If they have not done that, if your theories have worked out right, if these regulatory bodies have done what you said they would, and if the corporation that owns the franchise and the right that was given to it by the Government has not made anything but a fair and honest profit, this amendment will not touch such a corporation and will not affect it in any way.

It seems to me, if you believe in your theories that you have advocated, then here is a chance to put them to the test; you ought to support the amendment which the Senator has offered.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to hear all the debate on this bill. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was debating a certain amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Does that amendment provide that all these water powers shall be under the supervision of the Federal Government, although they may not be on a navigabe stream?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. GRONNA. How would it be possible for the Federal Government to know what the cost of operation would be for any dam that might not be on a navigable stream or under the supervision of the Government?

Mr. NORRIS. It does not apply to anything that is not on a navigable stream.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator knows that it is a very easy matter to keep a set of books in such a way that it would be impossible to ascertain what the profits were unless the concern was subject to supervision and inspection by the Federal Government or some other authority.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment provides that they must make yearly returns to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GRONNA. In all instances, whether they are under the control of the Government or not?

Mr. NORRIS. There will be none, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, in the bill even with or without the amendment, for it only applies to navigable streams. So, whether the amendment is adopted or not does not affect that. The amendment simply says that in the construction of the dams under this bill—which applies only to navigable streams—if above a reasonable profit, expense, and everything, there has been a surplus accumulated, and at the end of the 50 years the Government wants to take it over, it will value the property according to the bill and it will take from that amount the surplus over and above profits that are reasonable and fair.

Mr. GRONNA. So that it would only be a portion of these water-power companies that would be held to any accountability so far as the Government is concerned; but would not those that are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal control be taxed by the State?

Mr. NORRIS. I think they would be taxed on their property which is taxable within the State the same as any other corporation. I will say, however, to the Senator that there is not anything in the bill that is not subject to the control of the Government of the United States. The bill applies only to navigable streams, and there could not be anything constructed under this bill, if it is enacted into law, either with this amendment or without it, except permission was obtained, as the bill provides, from the Secretary of War.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I beg to say a word—and it will be a final word, so far as I am concerned—in reply to the argument made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. It must be remembered that through this bill we are imposing an extraordinary obligation upon the United States; an obligation that has, so far as I know, no precedent; that is, the obligation to take over the property and pay for it at the end of 50 years, or whenever the franchise period terminates. That fact ought not to be absent from the minds of Senators when they come to consider what it is fair to do at this time.

The Senator from Tennessee says that the various public-utility commissions will so regulate the charges that are to be made by these grantees that they can not secure more than a reasonable return upon the capital invested. There are two replies to that suggestion. First, a public-utility commission must operate for the future; it must fix a rate to be charged in the future. It is utterly impossible for any such commission, however intelligent, however well informed, however faithful to the public interest, to know what will occur in the future, and, with precision, to so regulate the rates that they will return but a fair interest or reward upon the capital. It is within the knowledge of every Senator here, I am sure, that many instances of regulation have occurred which, under experience, have been shown to have approved rates which have returned a great deal more than a reasonable reward upon the capital. So much depends upon the extent of the business, the development of the country, and all things of that kind that it is utterly impossible to regulate for the future with much exactness. But it is suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]—and I had forgotten about it for the moment—that the recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in what is known as the advance-rate cases illustrates far better than I could possibly do by argument or suggestion the inability to determine what certain rates will accomplish, so far as the accumulation of earnings is concerned.

However, there is another answer which, it seems to me, is conclusive. The Senator from Tennessee assumes all the while, in endeavoring to defend some of the provisions of this bill which I think are absolutely indefensible, that the entire energy created under the terms of the bill will fall under public regulation, and that the rates to be charged for the service will be determined by some public function; that is, by some department of the Government. He is in error about that in so far at least as I can conjecture of the future. I venture to say, as I have once before said, that by far the greater proportion of the power developed by enterprises established under this bill will be under no regulation whatsoever. Those enterprises will charge "whatever the traffic will bear." They will be controlled only by the force of competition; and if they can destroy competition, as is so often the case, they will be under no regulation whatsoever; and it is these instances that I have particularly in view.

It need not be apprehended that the Secretary of War will reverse or overthrow the action of public-utility commissions so far as the reasonableness of a specific return is concerned. If the public-utility commission says that 6 per cent is a fair return under all the circumstances, have you any fear that the Secretary of War will reverse that finding or that conclusion? No; but the Secretary of War will have this opportunity that the public-utility commission will not have: He will have an opportunity to ascertain what the effect of a certain rate has been; and if the commission, intending to allow the enterprise to recover from the public 6 per cent upon the value of the property or the cost of the property—whatever basis may be adopted—in fact allows it to recover from the public 15 per cent upon the capital, then the Secretary of War will have a chance to remedy that error, if it may be called an error, when the United States comes to perform this extraordinary obligation, to pay the grantee the value of the property at the end of the period of the franchise.

I confess that I am utterly unable to see the danger pointed out by the Senator from Tennessee, and I am unable to conceive a Senate which desires that the United States shall pay the grantee specifically at the end of the franchise a sum of money which the public has paid to the grantee during the operation of the franchise. I remark, as I did on yesterday, that we seem in framing this measure to be willing to vest the Secretary of War with all kinds of discretion for the protection of the grantee and unwilling to grant him any discretion to protect the public.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. I am not sure whether they were ordered yesterday or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were ordered on yesterday.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to answer the Senator, so far as I can.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it not reasonable to suppose that the stockholders will change considerably in 50 years?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Therefore the stockholders who own the property at the end of the 50 years would be, in all probability, different from those who receive the benefit of these excessive rates, if any such rates are allowed. Is that not a fact?

Mr. CUMMINS. My reply to that is that the purchase of stock in such a corporation at any time is voluntary. The stockholder who goes into a corporation, if it be a continuous one, at the end of 25 years ought to pay for the stock with knowledge of what the outcome may be; and if the stockholders who have preceded him in the same interest have taken more than they ought to have taken out of the property, then, when he comes to determine the value of the stock and the amount that he shall pay for it, he must be guided by those considerations.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Would not the subsequent purchaser of this stock have a right to presume that the State public-service commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission had honestly and justly fixed the rates, and therefore that their property would not be destroyed by a subsequent assessment of any kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that we all have a right to assume that any public official has performed his duty honestly and in accordance with the law, but I see in that conclusion nothing whatsoever in opposition to the argument I have been attempting to make.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask another question. Is it not a probability when this property is finally taken over and paid for after the lapse of 50 years that the majority at least of the bonds will be still outstanding, and the deduction the Senator proposes would come out of the bondholders and not out of the stockholders who received the benefit of the excessive rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel just as great an interest in the public as I do in the bondholders, and I desire to protect the public as well as the bondholders. Therefore I would not be very much alarmed about the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee. Still I answer it definitely in this way: The value of the property at the end of the franchise period, as determined by the provisions of the bill, the Senate having rejected what I believe to be a just method of ascertaining the value, must always very greatly exceed the value of the physical property. The Senate has deliberately adopted this rule, that at the end of the franchise period the value of the property is to be ascertained according to rules which will entitle whoever values it to take into consideration all of the intangible elements of value, the whole worth——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Excuse me just a moment—the whole worth of the business of which the property is a part, and I can not imagine that with a value so ascertained the deduction of the excessive surplus earned during the period would result in a sum less than the bonded indebtedness; but I say again that when one acquires bonds of a corporation the bondholder must accept some risk. It is not the purpose certainly that the Government shall absolutely guarantee the success of every one of these enterprises, although I must confess that I would rather give my assent to a plan by which the Government would undertake to guarantee the return of the capital and 6 per cent interest during the whole period than to agree to this measure as it now is. But that is apart from the question. The bondholder must assume, I think, that the corporation will deal fairly with him. If he can not so assume he ought not to become a bondholder in the corporation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose that what the Senator from Tennessee is afraid of is that the corporation will pay all of its earnings to the stockholders and that when the enterprise comes to an end there will be nothing left but the physical property itself; but I say to him that, even under those circumstances, there is no danger that any bondholder can ever be deprived of his security. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah pardon me if I ask the Senator from Iowa another question, following up those I have already asked?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Would not a liability of the kind the Senator proposes to be imposed upon the fund arising from the sale of the company's plant and required to pay outstanding bonds absolutely destroy the commercial value of the stock and bonds and prevent anyone from investing in them, and therefore be prohibitive of any development whatever under this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir. In my opinion, it would not repel the investment. On the contrary, assuming there is a demand for the power—and that must always, of course, depend upon circumstances—but assuming that there is a demand for the power generated, this bill gives to the bondholder of such an enterprise a security better than a Government bond. I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question about one feature of his proposed amendment. The amendment provides, among other things, that the surplus over and above the cost of operation, maintenance, and so forth, is to be ascertained by allowing, among other things, such reasonable return upon the remainder of the capital invested, not including investments from earnings, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

As I understand, that leaves it to the absolute discretion of the Secretary of War to fix the amount of such reasonable return as may seem to him to be proper. He may or may not be governed by legal principles or equitable principles. It seems to me that the whole thing is left in the arbitrary discretion of the Secretary of War.

I ask the Senator if the Secretary of War and the corporation should radically differ as to what was a reasonable return, whether the corporation would have any remedy, or whether it could go to a court to have that question settled, or whether this provision, if it go into the bill, would not constitute a condition which would bind the grantee, and would preclude him from having a judicial determination of the matter?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if we were attempting to regulate a property which individual enterprise had initiated, and concerning which the consent of the Government would not be required, the suggestion of the Senator from Utah would have great weight. I said yesterday, in arguing this point, that the power given to the Secretary of War in this bill is far greater than I like to confer upon any man. Unfortunately, that power is all conferred against the public, or substantially all. I do not mean to say that it would be used against the public in all instances, but it is a power that is given to the Secretary of War to make a bargain with capital or hold out inducements to capital which I am afraid will be sometimes very sadly misused. The power that I give to the Secretary of War in this amendment may also be misused. It is no greater than is given to him on a score of other subjects or phases in the bill, however; and if the grantee desires to enter into that sort of an agreement with the United States, it is no injustice to him.

Mark you, we are not taking the property of the grantee without compensation. We are agreeing with the grantee, as probably you will find no other Government under like circumstances has ever agreed, to take over and pay for the property at the end of 50 years of use of the stream. That is very unusual. I do not know of many instances in which a Government has undertaken to do that; and the value of that property is to be ascertained in the manner provided in the previous part of the section. But I say that if in the experience of the 50 years the corporation—if it be a corporation—shall earn more than enough to maintain it and pay the cost of its operation and pay all fixed charges, all the interest on the bonded debt and a reasonable return upon the independent capital invested, then this value, which I know will be an exaggerated one, may be reduced by that surplus, which never ought to have been created.

So far as I am concerned I am willing to give that power to the Secretary of War, and I am willing to trust him, just as he is trusted in other parts of this bill, to do the fair thing between the grantee and the public. He has it in his power to do the unfair thing, just as he has it in his power all the way through the bill to do the unfair thing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He has it in his power to act arbitrarily; and if he acts arbitrarily the other party——

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes; he has the power arbitrarily to prevent the improvement of the stream at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But if he acts arbitrarily, or if he acts unfairly, the other party to the transaction has no opportunity whatever of appealing to a tribunal which can adjust the matter between them.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is in error about that. If an applicant comes to the Secretary of War, he can attach to the entry upon the stream such conditions as to make it absolutely impossible for the applicant to go in at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But what I am saying is that if the Secretary of War, in fixing the amount of a reasonable return, acts arbitrarily or unfairly the other party to the transaction in that event is absolutely at his mercy. He can not appeal to a judicial tribunal.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would just as soon be at his mercy in that event as in the other. I recognize that it is a power that can be abused, but I do not fear that it will be abused as against the investor of the capital. I have more fear that it will be abused as against the general public.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me that it is a very unusual and a very dangerous power to confer upon an executive officer.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is unusual, because you are giving to the grantee here an unusual thing that has rarely been heard of in such grants; and if the Government were not under any obligation to take over the property and pay for it, then it would not be necessary to insert these precautions. But we are binding the Government to take this property. Now, how much ought the Government pay when it takes the property that has been built up on a 50-year franchise which has expired?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The usual provision in such cases, according to my recollection, where it is agreed that a municipality, for instance, may take over a street railroad, or something of that sort, is to have the value fixed by appraisers at the time it is acquired.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, that is not the policy pursued here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I see it is not.

RECESS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 4, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"As the heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth His handiwork," so may we, our heavenly Father, reflect Thy glory in our conduct toward Thee and our fellow men and display Thy handiwork in building for ourselves a character out of the material Thou hast woven into our being that we may be strong to resist evil and firm in the pursuits of righteousness. To whom much has been given of him much shall be required. Thou hast been lavish in Thy gifts to us as individuals and as a Nation; help us to use these gifts as individuals and as a people, that we may grow in all that makes for manhood and in all that makes for a strong and righteous Nation, that it may live and enjoy the fruits of righteousness. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I was going to ask unanimous consent to take up a conference report on a Senate bill and have it agreed to. That is in order at all times.

The SPEAKER. Of course, that is in order.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. It is Senate bill 3518.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, pending that I wanted to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] a question. We have a great many bills on the Private Calendar, and I would like, if possible, to get unanimous consent to go through those bills at some time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to state to the gentleman that if this legislative appropriation bill can be taken up to-day it is my hope that we may possibly finish it by to-morrow. Now, there is a tariff bill pending, and I have been notified by the gentleman in charge of that bill that he expects to take it up next Tuesday, and I was very anxious to get this bill up to-day in order to get it out of the way this week, so there would be no reason why that bill should not be taken up next Tuesday.

Mr. POU. I hope the House sometime during next week——

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] a request to make, or a suggestion to make, or a motion to make?

Mr. POU. I will ask, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], unanimous consent that to-morrow at 3 o'clock we have opportunity to call the Private Calendar by unanimous consent only.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POU. Provided they are through with this bill.

Mr. MANN. They will not be through with this bill at that time. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be quite willing to have an agreement that the House when it reaches the adjournment time this evening take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, with the understanding that the House stand adjourned at 11.50 or 11.55 to-morrow morning, and that during that time it consider bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU. I will make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Make what request?

Mr. MANN. That this evening the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning; that the House at 11.50 a. m. or 11.55 a. m. shall stand adjourned, and that the House when it convenes to-morrow morning shall consider bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Consider them for how long?

Mr. MANN. Until the House adjourns at 11.55 a. m.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until to-morrow morning when it adjourns to-day, and at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning the Private Calendar be considered by unanimous consent until 11.55 a. m., when the House will then stand adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this afternoon when the House gets ready to quit work that, instead of adjourning, it stand in recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, when the House shall meet again for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, and adjourn at 11.55 a. m.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman stated bills by unanimous consent on the Private Calendar.

Mr. POU. I did.

Mr. MANN. That would be bills not objected to?

Mr. POU. Bills not objected to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know when there would be consideration of some bills that are objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not inform the gentleman, except that certain private bills——

Mr. FERRIS. I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection for just a minute.

Mr. FERRIS. I do object for the present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On February 23, 1916:

H. R. 2. An act for the coinage of a McKinley souvenir gold dollar in commemoration of the erection of a memorial to William McKinley, late President of the United States;

H. R. 73. An act to amend chapter 231, known as the Judicial Code, act of March 3, 1911, volume 36, United States Statutes at Large, section 81, page 1111; and

H. R. 322. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the old post office and site thereof in the city of Dayton, Ohio.

On February 25, 1916:

H. R. 8810. An act to amend an act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, approved March 4, 1913.

On February 26, 1916:

S. 4308. An act to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes.

On February 28, 1916:

H. J. Res. 89. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved February 25, 1915;

H. R. 6854. An act permitting the Wolf Point Bridge & Development Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River in the State of Montana; and

H. R. 9416. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

On March 1, 1916:

H. R. 157. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912; and

S. 2497. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Anoka and Hennepin Counties, in the State of Minnesota.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY, MARCH 5.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi as Speaker pro tempore for Sunday, March 5, 1916, at the memorial exercises for the late Representative WITHERSPOON.

CONFERENCE REPORT—PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 288).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6.

ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
M. E. BURKE,
C. A. SULLOWAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
P. J. MCCUMBER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, viz:

Amendment No. 1: House recedes. Affidavits were filed in the case which met fully the objections of the House and justified the passage of the bill for soldier's relief.

Amendment No. 2. House recedes. Soldier's record of service is shown to have been three months, and he was paid for that length of service by the United States Government. He was subject to recall while on furlough for a few days, and his service entitles him to the pension provided in the bill, being the amount other soldiers of his age receive under the act of May 11, 1912.

Amendment No. 3: House recedes. The proposed increase is fully justified by the facts of the case as shown by the evidence on file.

Amendment No. 4: House recedes. This case falls within the rules of the Senate committee relative to increase of pensions for widows of officers of high rank and long service, and favorable action is warranted by the evidence on file.

Amendment No. 5: Senate recedes. Soldier resides in a National Military Home, and is now pensioned at $19 per month; the evidence on file does not show that he has anyone dependent upon him for support, and it is not believed that an increase of his pension is warranted by the facts shown in the report.

Amendment No. 6: House recedes. Soldier served in both the Civil War and the War with Spain, and attained the rank of major in the later service. The rules of the Senate committee provide a general-law rate for widows of officers in destitute circumstances, and the amount allowed in this case is fully justified by the evidence on file.

Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12207, the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to report to Congress at the beginning of its next session which of the subtreasuries, if any, should be continued after the end of the fiscal year 1917, and if, in his opinion, any should be continued the reasons in full for such continuance; also if any or all of said subtreasuries may be discontinued what legislation will be necessary in order to transfer their duties and functions to some other branch of the public service or to Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the purpose of this provision, page 62, lines 5 to 13?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This paragraph shows on its face exactly what it means. There has been some question in the committee and also in Congress as to whether or not it would be possible to abolish all or a portion of the subtreasuries. The officials of the Treasury Department have been giving the matter some consideration, but they were not prepared to indicate definitely whether or not any of these subtreasuries could be abolished at this time and the duties performed by some other governmental agency.

The committee felt, in order to bring the matter to a head, that this provision ought to be adopted, so that at the beginning of the next session of Congress there would be something before it of a definite nature. The gentleman understands, of course, that if any of these subtreasuries are eliminated it will be necessary to pass some legislation and to make some provision for the duties performed by those subtreasuries, and this section is simply proposed in order that information may be furnished to Congress at the beginning of the next session upon which it may act wisely and properly.

I may say to the gentleman that the members of the committee were of the opinion that it would be possible to eliminate some of these subtreasuries, but, of course, we were not in a position to make such recommendation at this time, because of the fact, as I have stated, that it would require additional legislation.

Mr. BENNET. This, in substance, is almost a resolution of inquiry. Of course it would not be in order as a resolution of inquiry, because it would require an expression of opinion, and therefore I assume that if the House is to arrive at this result at all, the only way it can arrive at the result is in the manner indicated by the committee, putting it in the bill. So far as I can see, it does not do anything except that it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report, upon which Congress may or may not act.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. That is the only object the committee had in inserting the section.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Tennessee know whether the Federal Reserve Board itself has taken any action or has expressed any opinion in reference to this matter?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not so far as I have been informed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Carson, Nev.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $1,800; assistant assayer, $1,200; chief clerk, $1,200; in all, $4,200.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years the House has always struck out the provision with regard to the assay offices. For a number of years the Director of the Mint recommended that these assay offices be abolished. It was discovered at the hearings this year that there is an additional reason why these assay offices should be abolished at this time. They really perform no useful service. If the assayer or those in charge of an assay office strictly followed the law they could have no work whatever to do. The Revised Statutes do not provide that the assayers shall assay ores, but the statutes do provide that the assayers shall assay bullion; but in order to evade this provision of the law the department is resting its case upon some old decision to the effect that ore and bullion are synonymous terms—a most ridiculous opinion. To follow that decision we must conclude that a quantity of ore that has 5 per cent of gold in it is bullion.

Now, if we should adopt an amendment which would require an assayer to assay only bullion you might as well close the offices. What they are doing is to assay the ore of the prospector. I do not believe that the importance attaches to these offices which gentlemen representing those districts in which the offices are located seem to think. I believe we could abolish these assay offices, with the exception of the one at New York and the one at Seattle, without detriment to the public service, and we would save many thousands of dollars annually.

This particular assay office carries an appropriation of $7,200. It is that much money thrown away, or practically so. Under the present arrangement it is now proposed to reduce the charge for assaying ore from $3 to $1, and therefore the amount of receipts will be very materially reduced. The receipts amount to little as it is. I believe that this House ought to do what it has undertaken to do for several years before, and that is to refuse to make appropriations for these assay offices.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think it is quite right for a Government assay office to offer to reduce the charge for assaying, say to $1, whereas the customary charge by a private assayer in the same vicinity is $1.25, thereby putting the Government in competition with private assayers, to the disadvantage of the private assayers?

Mr. GOOD. I do not think the Government should engage in that business at all, and I certainly think it should not engage in that unfair competition by cutting the rates.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, during my short service in this House I have encountered a good many surprises, but I never was more surprised than I have been this morning at the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. It seems to me it is the most unreasonable proposition that has been presented to this House for a long time.

I can not understand why Members from the eastern section of the country and the central section of the country in this House assume to know so much more about the conditions in the West than the Representatives from those States.

I was afforded no opportunity to appear before the Committee on Appropriations with reference to the proposed abolishment of the assay offices, and I do not know that any other Member from the West not on that committee had such an opportunity. I do not understand why it is proposed to discriminate against the mineral interests of the West, the miners and the prospectors out in that country, and yet to look so carefully after every other class of people. We are spending millions of dollars, gentlemen, to educate the farmers in scientific methods, and yet when it comes to doing something for the miners of the West and for the development of the mineral resources of the West some gentlemen propose to abandon a plan which has been in effect for 50 years or more. Under the law establishing the assay offices the mineral industry of the Rocky Mountain country has been greatly developed, and if these assay offices are abolished it simply means that the prospector out in the hills will have to send his bullion to the mint at Denver, or to some other distant place, at a considerable expense of money and a great deal of expense of time.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is mistaken when he states that the assay offices assay ore and not bullion. The miner out in the hills smelts the ore and treats it in such a way that the values can generally be so concentrated that they can be sent in small bags or boxes by mail or express to the assay office. The assay offices are operating entirely under the law and not, as the gentleman says, contrary to the law. He said hundreds of thousands of dollars would be saved if these assay offices were abolished. I do not know what system of figures he uses; but with reference to the assay office at Boise, for instance, the income from that office last year is $6,363 and the expense $8,191, although the deposits amounted to $916,502.90—nearly a million dollars. This Government contributes only about $1,700 toward the encouragement of the development of the mineral resources of that particular section of the country. In addition, when the gentleman states that ores are being assayed at the assay offices I call his attention to the fact that in the Boise office 103,966 pounds were assayed. You can readily understand that would mean only a small quantity of ore, when, as a matter of fact, it represents nearly 800 different deposits sent in there by the different mining companies or by prospectors, and there was lost in melting only 3,500 pounds, or less than 3½ per cent, showing the relative value of the bullion. These prospectors out in the hills depend on their efforts to secure value from Mother Earth for their living, just as the man with the hoe or the plow depends upon his efforts in cultivating the soil for his living, and they are entitled to as much consideration.

Mr. GOOD. I will say, as to this particular item which we are considering, that, according to the statement of Mr. Woolley, while the estimate calls for $7,200 there was only $1,600 received last year; and Mr. Woolley did say that they had very little to do, and in order to keep them busy they were allowing them to assay ores.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That has no reference whatever to the Boise office.

Mr. GOOD. I am not talking about the Boise office.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I know you are not talking about the Boise office, but the plan is, as you reach these different items, if you knock out one, to knock them all out; and I can tell you that such action will be resented by the mineral interests of the western country. I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Idaho) there were—ayes 15, noes 89.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at Philadelphia: Superintendent, $4,500; engraver, $4,000; assayer, $3,000; melting and refining department—superintendent, $3,000; superintendent, coining department, $2,500; chief clerk, $2,500; assistant assayer, $2,200; cashier, $2,500; bookkeeper, $2,500; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000; deposit weigh clerk, $2,000; assistant cashier, $1,800; curator, $1,800; clerks—1 $2,000, 1 $1,700, 8 at $1,600 each, 1 $1,500, 6 at $1,400 each, 1 $1,300, 3 at 1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each; in all, $68,600.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was rather surprised when I read this bill down to this point and discovered that in the first half of this item they had omitted an appropriation for one officer, assistant superintendent of the mint at Philadelphia; and I wondered what our genial and learned friend from Philadelphia, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would say if it was proposed to cut out one of the salaried officers at this mint. But when I went on farther down I found that apparently they had provided a place for the same man under a different title, calling him assistant bookkeeper instead of assistant superintendent.

Mr. GOOD. They cut out one clerk at $1,700.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether this is a mere change of title or whether, having found the necessity for an assistant bookkeeper this year, they will find next year an additional necessity for an assistant superintendent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This change was made in accordance with the estimates submitted. They stated that they did not want an assistant superintendent at $2,000, and they cut out one clerk at $1,700, but that they needed an assistant bookkeeper, by reason of the fact that the work in accounting at the mint was increasing very rapidly. It seems to be simply a part of their scheme of reorganization, as the director stated, spending money where it is needed and saving it where it is not needed. It is simply a matter of administration, and involves a decrease in the expenditures at the mint, amounting to $1,700.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was this change recommended by the department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was recommended by the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Simply a change in the method of conducting the office at Philadelphia?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Simply a change in the administration of the office in accordance with what was thought by the department to be needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I presume this change was made in accordance with the established policy of the present administration, which is an administration of marked change. There may have been some reason for disposing of an assistant superintendent at the Philadelphia Mint and having an assistant bookkeeper substituted. I presume it was a matter of administration; possibly of economy. However, since the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my distinguished leader upon this side of the House, has called attention to the fact that the Philadelphia Members should take note of changes of this kind, I wish to say that we are alive to all sorts of changes, both in Philadelphia and in Washington. This is an era of change, not only in the matter of administrative bills brought into the House by the Committee on Appropriations, but in the matter of party policy; change in the matter of the Panama Canal tolls, for instance; change in the matter of peace and preparedness; change, as my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] would say, in everything—except the Treasury of the United States. I think that may partly account for the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that Members upon the floor should be alive to the changes made in so small a matter as an administrative bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at New York: Superintendent, $5,000; assayer, $3,000; superintendent, melting and refining department, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500; cashier, deposit weigh clerk, and assistant assayer, at $2,500 each; assayer's assistant, $2,000; bookkeeper, $2,350; assistant cashier, $1,800; clerks—2 at $2,000 each, 4 at $1,800 each, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,500, 1 $1,250, 7 at $1,000 each; private secretary, $1,400; in all, $51,100.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the committee if there was any evidence offered before them as to the increase in business in the assay office of New York in the last year, in fact in the last two years, owing to the tremendous imports of gold from foreign countries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was considerable evidence at the hearings showing an increase of more than $100,000,000.

Mr. BENNET. Did the department recommend any increase for the office force? I notice that this item is precisely the same as last year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They did not, and the committee allowed for the office force exactly in accordance with the estimate submitted by the department.

Mr. BENNET. The committee is not to blame that in spite of the large increase of work there is no increase in the salaries. I notice on the next page that the committee increased the amount for labor and the item for sweepage.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They needed an increase for the workmen, but did not for the office force on account of the increased business.

Mr. BENNET. At any rate, the department did not ask for it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It did not.

Mr. BENNET. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, wastage in the melting and refining department, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion, $70,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this item and the item before it there is an increase of $10,000 each over last year. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if these are increases asked for by the department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The department estimated for $70,000 for this item, and the committee allowed the full amount of the estimate. That is an increase of $10,000 over and above what they had for the current year.

Mr. BENNET. The committee cut down the estimate of the preceding item from $100,000 to $90,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; it did not. For the current year there was an appropriation for workmen and other employees of $80,000. An estimate was submitted for $95,000 and the committee allowed $90,000, which is an increase of $10,000 over the current year.

Mr. BENNET. I understand. The paragraph having already been read I suppose it is too late to have it amended, but I would like to say in all seriousness that I think the committee made a mistake. I am familiar to some extent with the conditions in the assay office in New York.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman realizes that much of the increase of business is due to the abnormal conditions existing at the present time. The committee did not assume that these conditions would continue to exist during the entire period of the next fiscal year.

Mr. BENNET. I assure the chairman of the committee and the committee that what I shall say is, to some extent, the result of personal knowledge. It seems to me that the committee might have given the benefit of the doubt to the office, because if conditions did not continue, as they may, it would not be necessary to use the entire amount. At present the laborers in the assay office in New York City are working under what are practically inhumane conditions. The work is in connection with furnaces, accompanied by a great deal of dust and dirt and acid fumes, and what I assume to be unhealthful conditions. Owing to the increase in business, handling $100,000,000 more than they did last year, these men have been compelled to work continually at that confining and laborious occupation. I realize almost the futility of any attempt to have the figures placed at the estimate, but inasmuch as the amount is small and is recommended by the department, the Members from the Borough of Manhattan can assure the committee that in reality the conditions are very bad, and I want to ask if it would not be doing justice if the chairman of the committee would increase it to the amount called for by the estimate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee allowed for this office every dollar that was asked for except the $5,000 for the workmen and other employees, and it increased that item $10,000 over the current year. A large part of this increase is due to the abnormal conditions now prevailing, and the committee felt that an increase of $10,000 would, in all probability be sufficient for the next fiscal year. I suggest to the gentleman that if there is any reason why there should be an increase the department can come to Congress by way of a deficiency estimate and secure such amount as may be necessary. Under the circumstances the committee, not being able to say that these present conditions would continue to prevail during the entire fiscal year, was very liberal in allowing $10,000.

Mr. BENNET. Without undertaking to bind the appropriation committee to anything, can I take it that the remarks of the gentleman mean that it is rather the sense of the committee that if unusual conditions should continue there would be no serious opposition to a deficiency that would bring the amount up to the estimate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I would not care for the gentleman to assume that from the remarks I made. I am not a member of the deficiency subcommittee, and I hope and believe that the $10,000 will be entirely sufficient. What I did mean to say was that if the department could make a proper showing there would be no trouble in securing a deficiency.

Mr. BENNET. I did not move to amend because I thought the committee was worthy of commendation for increasing the amount over last year, and that it would be a left-handed compliment for a Representative from that portion of the country, so long as the committee had increased the appropriation, to attempt to increase it still further, but I did want to bring the attention of the committee to the fact that these needs are real.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, the committee was impressed with the idea and showing that the shipment of gold to this office from abroad had materially advanced during the current fiscal year, and owing to the fact that it had increased some hundred million dollars during the present year the amount of labor necessary to take care of that abnormal increase moved the committee to make an increase of $10,000 in the current appropriation. A careful reading of the hearings will show that that abnormal growth will not continue. This increase will take care of the abnormal amount of additional work of the office until the end of the fiscal year. There could not, perhaps, be an increase over and above what has been coming into the office during the present disturbed conditions in Europe, which caused the shipment of great amounts of gold to this country to purchase war supplies. Perhaps it may become necessary now that they resort to other means of buying supplies, the gold reserve being so much depleted in Europe, and they will begin to issue bonds and purchase our gold for the purpose of purchasing these supplies.

Mr. BENNET. I do not wish to go into that question at all.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman sees what was in the mind of the committee.

Mr. BENNET. I am very glad that the committee made the increase it did, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchasing and supplying uniforms to park, Monument, and bridge watchmen, $2,800.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How often do we supply new uniforms to these watchmen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As often as they are needed; about once every two years is my recollection; that is, so far as overcoats are concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall the testimony, they have one winter suit and a summer suit each year, and an overcoat every two years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Here is what Col. Harts has to say upon the subject:

Col. HARTS. Those uniforms lap over. We do not buy a set of uniforms one year and then omit them the next. The way we have it arranged now there are always some men who require overcoats, which will last them two years, and next year there are other men.

Mr. BYRNS. How much of the appropriation for the last fiscal year did you spend?

Col. HARTS. We spent it all.

Mr. BYRNS. How much of the present appropriation has been expended up to this time?

Col. HARTS. We divide the year so we will not run short, and we simply make the uniforms do until the end of the fiscal year, whether they are up to the mark or not.

Mr. BYRNS. This is in the nature, at least, of a fixed charge?

Col. HARTS. Yes, sir.

As the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests, in so far as the uniforms are concerned, they have a light uniform and a winter uniform, the former usually lasting one season and the latter two years.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter all appointments of persons employed under the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building shall be made only by such superintendent.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve it while the chairman or some of us are permitted to explain the reason for it?

Mr. KEATING. If the chairman wishes to explain it, I will reserve it, but I shall insist upon the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we have the anomalous situation that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds has the supervision of these employees—the watchmen, charwomen, and other persons employed in the care and upkeep of this building—and yet has no authority to make the appointments. Of course they are all under the classified service, and the appointments are made from certifications submitted by the Civil Service Commission, except those respecting charwomen.

Mr. FOSTER. Does this take them out of the civil service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not by any means. It merely gives to the superintendent, instead of to the commission, consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, the right to make these appointments from the classified list. It does not interfere in any way with the civil-service status of the employees in that building.

Mr. FOSTER. They are selected from the civil-service list now? Of course they have to take them from that list.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the proposition. It is not intended by any means to interfere with the civil-service status of these employees, if that is what the gentleman has in mind; but I do think that where a man holds the position of superintendent, with all these people under him, it is rather anomalous that he should not have the appointment of them under the law.

Mr. FOSTER. Take the postmasters. They have to take men in their offices whether they like it or not. I do not see why we should exempt one man and give him the right. I remember that we have paid losses in the Treasury because of some minor employee, the employer being held good on the bond until Congress relieves him, and those cases are continually coming up, and one of the defenses they make is that they can not select their own assistants. It seems to me that if we do not permit those men who are responsible for large sums of money to make any selection we should not permit it with a superintendent. There may be some good reason for it, but I do not know it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman understands that the State, War, and Navy Building has virtually three department heads—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of War. The administration of that building under the law is left to the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building. Why should not the superintendent, Col. Harts, charged with the responsibility of caring for it, be vested with full authority as to the employment of the personnel under his supervision?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is true; and yet the three officials who are named as the custodians of that building are, as I understand, the three Secretaries—the Secretary of State, of War, and of the Navy. They are the real custodians of the building.

Mr. STAFFORD. There were instances called to our attention where, by reason of that divided authority, they can not apportion the space economically in that building, causing large expenditures of money because of no central authority being vested in some one head. Of course that refers to another provision in the bill, but the gentleman will agree to the business principle that where a person is charged with the responsibility of keeping up a building he should be vested with the authority of the appointment of the force under him.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not usually the case under civil service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, up until recently the jurisdiction or the right of the superintendent to make these appointments has never been questioned. It is only very recently that any question has been raised as to his authority.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is it necessary to make these changes if he has the right to do it now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is for the simple reason that his right has recently been questioned, and the committee felt that, having the responsibility and being charged with the responsibility of keeping that building clean and in proper repair and condition, he ought to have some discretion in making the appointments.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman that a great many of these officials who are at the head of certain departments or bureaus or other places ought to have that right, and possibly the superintendent of this building may have some good reason for asking this, and I am not saying that possibly it would be administered better, and yet I do not see why, where every department must take the persons who are given to them under the civil service, in view of the fact that these others must take them—and during my time in this House I have seen several claims come before the Congress in which clerks, it was claimed, had lost money for the Government, and the excuse they made when they came in here was that they were compelled to take those clerks who were not of their own selection—so it seems to me, in reference to those who are employed under the superintendent, it is no greater hardship upon him than anybody else, the way I look at it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this in any way affects the status of anybody under this department who has charge of duties under the commission, but it struck the committee with this force, that a man who has control of employees should be a man who has the right, if necessary, for insubordination, to discharge an employee, or should have the right to make requests when he needs additional employment. Now, it is rather an embarrassing position for a man to be in who has charge of laborers and the performance of their duties to be compelled always to go to somebody else who does the appointing.

Now, you take the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds here, Congress gives him the right to control all of those appointments. He comes before the committee and makes request for additional employees. He administers that same service here that the superintendent of this building administers there, and that is true of all the other superintendents of all the other buildings.

Mr. MANN. May I ask a question of the gentleman from Mississippi, as to whether the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds has full control over appointments under him?

Mr. SISSON. Has full control?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Of certain clerks and employees, he has absolute control over them.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was run by the Democratic committee on patronage.

Mr. SISSON. That is only in reference to those employees that are for the House, under the control of the majority, that formerly used to be under the control of the Speaker of the House, who formerly had all the power.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; the gentleman is not making a correct statement about that, and he knows it.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that I am making an incorrect statement. The statement may be incorrect, but I do not know that I am incorrect in making it.

Mr. MANN. There has been no change in the law as to who makes appointments in relation to the office of Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

Mr. SISSON. There has been no change of law?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says now the superintendent has the power, whereas formerly the Speaker had the power. I say there has been no change in the law.

Mr. SISSON. No; but the present Speaker appoints men who are recommended by a Democratic caucus. You take the joint employees between the House and Senate, and their control is vested in the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, and he has control of those employees absolutely; and that is true in reference to the superintendent of the Treasury Building and all the other buildings in the Government that have superintendents—they are controlled absolutely by the superintendent.

Mr. MANN. Only recently the Democratic caucus had a Republican discharged under very unfair conditions, on certain charges which were made in the Democratic caucus which were not correct, and then the gentleman says the Superintendent of the Capitol has the power.

Mr. SISSON. And yet that employee was actually discharged by the Superintendent of the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I know he was, by direction of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. SISSON. He had the power; it does not matter what the removing cause was.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this debate has nothing to do with my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the point of order was reserved.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, one moment on this proposition. I had the floor; whether I got it by the yielding of the gentleman from Illinois to me or not, I suggest that I have physical possession of it. Now, your committee felt that, in view of the fact that the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building was responsible for the proper conduct of all the employees under him, was responsible for the condition of the building, responsible for the repairs that should be made and the character of the repairs made, responsible for the manner in which it was done, and responsible for the conduct of all these employees, it would be proper that he should have control of it instead of the commission. Now, these three Cabinet officers have enough to attend to without making them quasi superintendents of a building.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. MANN. Who is the superintendent?

Mr. SISSON. Col. Harts.

Mr MANN. Is he the superintendent to whom a salary allowance for $3,000 is included in this bill?

Mr. SISSON. I think so. I will see.

Mr. MANN. Col. Harts is an Army officer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Mr. SISSON. I was mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. The bill carries an item in here for "superintendent, $3,000."

Mr. SISSON. What page is that on?

Mr. MANN. Page 74, lines 9 and 10.

Mr. SISSON. He is detailed as an Army officer under the law that was passed in reference to this building soon after it was constructed and partially occupied. He is detailed and gets pay as an Army officer, but gets no additional pay.

Mr. MANN. Then what is the office that is called "superintendent, $3,000"? That is why I am trying to find out. The item is the "Office of Public Buildings and Grounds, superintendent, $3,000."

Mr. SISSON. You have gotten me confused here. You are on the wrong page. We are on page 76—the State, War, and Navy Department. You are on the Office of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Is there a different superintendent?

Mr. SISSON. He is the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. He is a different man and has nothing to do with the State, War, and Navy Building.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman does not know, and I am sure I do not.

Mr. SISSON. Well, but that is the fact about it, and I know that I am right. This Superintendent of Buildings and Grounds is an entirely different man and has absolutely nothing in the world to do with the State, War, and Navy Department. That department——

Mr. MANN. Col. Harts is in charge of all the public buildings and grounds in Washington. He is the officer of the Army in charge.

Mr. SISSON. For instance, they have a superintendent in the Library over here.

Mr. MANN. Outside of the Capitol.

Mr. SISSON. They have a superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building, and the Superintendent of the Public Buildings and Grounds is an entirely different office.

Mr. MANN. All right. Then let me ask my distinguished friend, who is a learned constitutional lawyer, concerning a subject of the greatest importance. Where is the constitutional authority for Congress to provide for the appointment of officers by anybody except the President, Cabinet officers, or the head of a department or courts of law?

Mr. SISSON. Here is the law.

Mr. MANN. I know, but I am talking about the Constitution now.

Mr. SISSON. You are talking about the Constitution?

Mr. MANN. The Constitution says——

Mr. SISSON. I am glad to know that the gentleman invokes the Constitution occasionally. It is a rare thing in this House.

Mr. MANN. I know what the Constitution is, and I am informing the gentleman, because he is ignorant of it.

Mr. SISSON. I am not ignorant——

Mr. MANN. That is only a reply to the gentleman's statement to me, both in good nature and both untrue. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. What is the part of the Constitution to which you wish to call my attention?

Mr. MANN. Referring to the powers of the President, it says:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law—

Now, this is established by law—

> but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Now, where is there any constitutional power to say that a superintendent of a building shall make appointment of these officers?

Mr. SISSON. Let us see what the law is. If you create that a department——

Mr. MANN. That is no department.

Mr. SISSON. Let us see what the law is. It says:

> The President is authorized to designate from the Engineer Corps of the Army or Navy an officer well qualified for the purpose, who shall be detailed to act as superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building under the direction of the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, who are constituted a commission for the purposes of the care and supervision of said building.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Just one moment. Now, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the duties of this man, just one word. The committee thought that you would have better administration in reference to the superintendent of this building if you vested him with this power over the employees. Now, it is not a question of how he gets his appointment; it is a question of the duty and control of him after he gets it, and the control that you give him over the employees that are working directly under him and receive their daily instruction from him, and we feel that the man ought to have that power and that authority, and for that reason your committee put this provision in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in charge of the bill desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 8, page 76, for the purpose of offering an amendment to reduce the sum of $240 to $120.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 76, line 8, in lieu of "$240," insert the sum of "$120," and in the same line, in lieu of the sum of "$490," insert the sum of "$370."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the usual rate that we pay for the upkeep of motorcycles? There are a great many in the Government. I suppose we desire to pay the same to all of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The superintendent stated that $12 a month was the usual amount.

Mr. MANN. Twelve dollars a month would be more than $120.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed that in the District of Columbia the commissioners say that $12 a month is a reasonable amount for the upkeep of a motorcycle.

Mr. MANN. Then, why do you not propose to appropriate $12 a month?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That would depend entirely on the use. This motorcycle would not be used so much in all probability. I will say to the gentleman that the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds asked for the privilege of purchasing two motorcycles, and he stated that $240 would be sufficient for the upkeep of both of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit right there? I think the gentleman is in error. I think the bill as reported is correct. I wish to call attention to the draft of the bill, to the recommendation made by this officer, which was for two motorcycles at $250 each, where the committee allowed only one. It is as follows:

> For purchase of two motorcycles, at $250 each, and for the upkeep of same at $240 each, $980.

Now, if we had granted the estimate asked for, there would have been $500 for purchase price, and the upkeep of each would have been $480, which would make the total $980, so that I think the bill as drafted is correct, and that the gentleman is in error in his assumption that it should be reduced one-half for the upkeep.

Mr. MANN. That estimate was made when gasoline was costing 15 cents a gallon or thereabouts. Now it is nearly double that.

Mr. SISSON. In the service of the government of the District of Columbia, where motorcycles have to go long distances, they estimate the upkeep at $12 a month. It depends, of course, upon the distance that the user of the motorcycle has to go daily. These people go from park to park, and of course they try to give the man who has charge of the parks such parks as are as close to each other as possible, so that he can make his rounds from park to park in policing the parks. That is the use to which this motorcycle is to be put. The sum of $240 a year for that sort of service for upkeep, where the user of the motorcycle remains for a time at one park and then goes to another park would be excessive, because it would not require as much gasoline as it would in the case where he goes long distances and is constantly on the go.

Mr. MANN. These people are on the go more than an ordinary police officer, probably.

Mr. SISSON. The difference is that they go very much greater distances than this man will go, and he makes only a certain number of trips between one park and another. I do not believe that $120, at the present price of gasoline, would be quite enough if the park policeman or guard would have occasion to use a motorcycle constantly, but I think that $240, even at the present high price of gasoline would be more than would be required.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe that you can maintain a motorcycle and keep it in proper condition and in operation and repair for $120 a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Ten dollars a month is all that has ever been allowed for the upkeep of motorcycles. Three hundred and sixty dollars is given for the maintenance of three motorcycles in the inspection service in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman will recall that we had that very question up before our committee when we were marking up our bill and that we accepted the recommendation of Col. Harts for the upkeep at $240 each. Certainly we have no testimony to proceed upon to reduce it by one-half, except that which which the gentleman is now presenting. It certainly was the intention of the committee to grant the estimate for one motorcycle, which would cost $250, and for the upkeep of the same at $240.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly the gentleman does not think it would cost $20 a month to keep up a motorcycle.

Mr. STAFFORD. I say that is the estimate of Col. Harts, at $240 a year, and we granted that estimate. The gentleman's suggestion goes contrary to the recommendation of Col. Harts.

Mr. SISSON. In every department of the Government where they are using motorcycles in no case is as much as $240 allowed, and if that amount is allowed here it will lead to others estimating for the same amount. A good or new motorcycle would require only the gasoline, but an older machine has to go to the shop and be repaired and have its tires renewed, and only about half of the amount of this appropriation could be used for gasoline. When the motorcycle is old the upkeep is as great as the cost. For that reason I do not believe that we should give for the upkeep of these new motorcycles more than $120, which is the general rule for the upkeep of motorcycles. It costs only this amount of money to maintain automobiles in the service.

Mr. MANN. Is $240 a year the amount of the upkeep of automobiles?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; in the District. I will state this to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. The estimate is for two motorcycles at $250 each and for the upkeep at $240 each.

Mr. SISSON. For the maintenance of automobiles throughout the District service they are asking for this fiscal year $25 a month. I do not know whether it is enough or not. But they are asking $25 a month for the maintenance of automobiles in the District of Columbia for this fiscal year and $12 for motorcycles, as I am informed by the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we have nothing in the hearings to guide us as to the amount to be allowed for the upkeep of the motorcycle other than the statement of Col. Harts. I can not appreciate the position of the gentleman from Mississippi, that if we will grant $240 for the upkeep of this motorcycle it is going to be needlessly used. If we are going to allow one of these park police—the sergeant—to have the use of this motorcycle to go about the District to see that the men are attending properly to their duties, we should not restrict him as to the amount of money to be used for gasoline and oil so that he can properly and efficiently perform those duties. It is ridiculous economy to authorize the purchase of a motorcycle and then cut down the allowance that may be used for its upkeep. Certainly this sergeant is not going to take joy rides out of the District. He is going to be restricted to the use of this motorcycle in the performance of his duty, and with the present mounting price of gasoline—more than double what it was six months ago—to place it on the basis at which it cost the motorcycle last year to be operated is a matter that I can not subscribe to. It is parsimony in the extreme.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman knows that there never has been appropriated that much for upkeep, irrespective of the use of these machines, and if you fix the maintenance of this motorcycle at $240 a year, you might just as well make up your mind that we will have to do it with reference to all the other motorcycles. You may say we will not have to do it unless we want to, but you know the history of appropriations just as well as anybody, and that is always the result. I do not believe in giving them more money than is needed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take a position diametrically opposite to that taken by the gentleman from Mississippi. He believes that when we purchase a motorcycle we should keep it in the garage.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I do not believe anything of the kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman believes we should restrict the amount of money to be appropriated for oil and gas.

Mr. SISSON. I do not want the gentleman to put me in a false light, or to represent me as saying something I did not say.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the direct conclusion to be drawn from the position which the gentleman takes.

Mr. SISSON. There is no conclusion of that kind, when all the departments of the Government get along with a less amount of money.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is only one question before the committee, and that is whether we should appropriate a sufficient amount of money to operate these motorcycles. With the present high price of gasoline, it is natural that the cost of maintenance of a motorcycle will be more than what it has been in the past; and I believe when we purchase a motorcycle or an automobile, it is because the use of the machine will result in economy and increased efficiency, and that the employee should not be restricted to do part of the work by motorcycle and then the rest of the work during the day on foot, but that he should be given the power to utilize the motorcycle ad libitum to the maximum efficiency. There is nothing before the committee except the recommendation of Col. Harts as to the amount necessary for the upkeep of this motorcycle, and that is $240. Of course it is possible for the gentleman to cut it down one-half and claim it is economy, but I respectfully contend it is false economy, and that as the use of these motorcycles is restricted to official business there is no danger of any gasoline being wasted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the use of these motorcycles is restricted, we should not cripple that use by restricting the amount of money that is necessary for the operation. I hope that the chairman of the committee will now recognize his error in making this proposition to reduce the amount to $120. Of course if the chairman wishes to follow the statement as to the cost of operation of other motorcycles, that is a legitimate ground, but there was nothing like that before the committee when we estimated the amount that would be needed for the maintenance of this machine.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment, if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 76, in line 8, in lieu of the sum "$240" insert the sum "$120," and in the same line, in lieu of the sum "$490," insert the sum "$370."

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to offer the suggestion that with the Government time and money already spent in this discussion we could have bought probably four motorcycles, and I hope that the item will stand as reported by the committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 20, noes 32.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. If you are going to call for tellers on an amendment involving $100, we will keep a quorum here the rest of the afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-eight Members—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Adair	Driscoll	Holland	Rowland
Aiken	Dunn	Hughes	Sabath
Anthony	Edmonds	Husted	Saunders
Aswell	Estopinal	Johnson, Ky.	Scott, Pa.
Barchfeld	Fitzgerald	Jones	Scully
Browne, Wis.	Flynn	Langley	Sells
Buchanan, Ill.	Gallagher	Liebel	Snell
Campbell	Gard	Loft	Steagall
Cannon	Graham	McCracken	Vare
Carlin	Gillett	McDermott	Ward
Casey	Gregg	Mondell	Watson, Va.
Clark, Fla.	Griest	Moss, W. Va.	Wheeler
Coleman	Griffin	Mott	Williams, Wm. E.
Copley	Hamilton, Mich.	Nelson	Wilson, Ill.
Crago	Hamilton, N. Y.	Parker, N. Y.	Wilson, La.
Cullop	Hay	Powers
Dies	Hayes	Price
Dooling	Henry	Riordan

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 12207, had found itself without a quorum and had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 359 Members answered to their names, and he presented herewith the names of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee found itself without a quorum the committee was dividing on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. No quorum having been present, the Chair will put the question again de novo.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee) there were 80 ayes and 87 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, lights, repairs, miscellaneous items, printing, and city directories, $32,000: Provided, That the commission in charge, or a majority of the members thereof, may reapportion space among the departments now occupying the State, War, and Navy Department Building as in their judgment may be necessary from time to time, but such reapportionment shall in no event involve the ejectment from the building of any department, or the office or bureau of any department, now occupying the same.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the proviso that it is not authorized by law. It is new legislation, because by the act of August 5, 1882, a joint committee of Congress was empowered to apportion the space in the different rooms in the War, State, and Navy Department, and under the provisions of that act and an additional act of 1887, the Secretaries of War, State, and Navy have the power to apportion space within their respective departments. Therefore an act of Congress is necessary to apportion the space in this manner and to give it to the superintendent of the building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is good and therefore sustains it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 77, in place of the paragraph stricken out, lines 6 to 14, inclusive, insert the following:

"Provided, That the commission in charge, or a majority of the members thereof, may at any time reapportion space among the departments now occupying the State, War, and Navy Department Building, if the same can be done with the reduction of the amount of floor space occupied by any branch of the public service in said building, in the reduction or avoidance of public expense for rent of office or storage space for the Government, and the reduction of the number of watchmen required for said building from 40 to not less than 38."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think it is subject to a point of order under the Holman rule, because it provides for the reduction of the number carried in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. This amendment provides for a change in existing law. It does not propose to reduce the amount of the appropriation in the bill, but permits the appropriation to remain as it is. It is true that it provides for a reduction of the number of watchmen in the building to not less than 38, but it does not provide any way in which that can be done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a suggestion.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to perfect the amendment by substituting the word "more" for the word "less" in the last line, so that it will read "not more than 38."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Tennessee modifies his amendment in the manner stated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that probably the amendment is not germane to the paragraph, regardless of whether it comes within the Holman rule or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. The paragraph reads "For fuel, light, repairs, miscellaneous items, printing, and city directories, $32,000." I do not quite understand how it would be germane to provide for a reduction of watchmen in connection with that paragraph or to provide for a reapportionment of the space in the State, War, and Navy Building. I understand it is a proviso to the paragraph I have read, but I believe that under the Holman rule whatever else may be done—and you may do almost anything if you propose some reduction—the amendment has to be germane.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is proposed to a paragraph which provides for fuel, light, repairs, miscellaneous items, and city directories, $32,000. The fuel, light, and repairs are for this particular building, and this amendment proposes a plan whereby the space in that building may be reapportioned. I want to say this on the merits of the proposition, so that members of the committee may understand exactly the purpose of the committee in offering this amendment to take the place of the paragraph which was stricken out on a point of order. There is not a public building in the city of Washington, outside of the Library Building, which is quite so expensive as the War, State, and Navy Building. The reason I make that statement is this: That building cost the Government originally more than $10,000,000. It houses now not exceeding 1,500 employees of the Government, which means that it costs this Government in the neighborhood of $7,000 per person for every employee in the building. By previous legislation the force employed in the several bureaus of the War Department has been reduced within the past three years and the ensuing year 128 persons, and there has been no corresponding reduction of space occupied by the Army officials and employees.

On the other hand, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance came before the committee and requested it to recommend renting additional office space, amounting to $5,000, to take care of extra draftsmen authorized under the deficiency act. More than that, The Adjutant General's office alone has been reduced by 58 employees within the last two years, but no reduction has been made in the amount of floor space occupied by the office in the State, War, and Navy Building. We have just provided in this bill for 42 additional employees in the State Department, and I want to say to you, gentlemen, that unless some provision is made whereby they can get additional space in that building you will doubtless be confronted with the proposition to provide additional space in some other building to take care of these 42 additional employees for the State Department.

The superintendent of the building states that by rearrangement of the space 20 rooms, with a floor area approximating 7,600 square feet, can be made available for the pressing needs of the public service. Equivalent space, with heat, light, and elevator service, if rented, would cost this Government, at 85 cents a square foot, $6,640 per annum. That is what the striking out of this provision on the point of order means. It means that this Government will be deprived of floor space amounting to $6,640 a year, and, as I have stated, it will probably be necessary to make outside provision for these increased employees in the State Department and pay the money out of the Treasury for proper space. This amendment does not propose to interfere with anyone in the State, War, and Navy Building. The amendment on its face provides that it shall not interfere with any bureau or any public service in that building. It is, after all, left with this commission, consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Why is this change in the law proposed? Why is it that the old rule, about each of these heads of the various departments having the right to allot the space, and so forth, should not be continued? Is not that working all right?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are held to have no right now to allot space under a law passed 32 years ago. Congress undertook to apportion the space in that building at that time. The apportionment was made under legislation. It is simply proposed now to give a majority of the commission, composed of these three heads of the departments, the right or discretion to reapportion the space, reserving to every bureau and to every public service now in the building the right to remain there. The Superintendent of Public Buildings states that if this permission is given that commission can provide for 20 additional rooms—space now occupied by, possibly the bureau of The Adjutant General and some other bureau, without inconvenience to its work.

Mr. COX. How much will it cost if this point of order is finally sustained, to rent quarters?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It will cost for this space, figuring it at 85 cents a square foot, which is the amount paid by the Government in the Southern and the Woodward Buildings, $6,640 per year, if this point of order is sustained and this proposed amendment not adopted.

Mr. COX. If the amendment is not stricken out on the point of order and remains in the bill, the Government will save that amount of money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely, because, as I say, we have provided for 42 additional employees in the State Department, and unless some provision is made whereby they can be taken care of in this building, the gentleman knows they will doubtless ask for space to be rented in other buildings in order to make proper provision for them. This does not discommode anyone.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Who has the authority now to make the rearrangement of space in this building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no authority existing in the commission because, as I understand it, by an act passed in 1883, Congress undertook to apportion space, and it has been held that the commission has absolutely no authority to make any rearrangement.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that there has been no change in the space in that building in the last 20 years?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There may have been changes within the space allotted each department.

Mr. MANN. But no change between the departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No change from the original assignment made by Congress back in 1883. They assigned a certain portion to the State Department, a certain portion to the War Department, and a certain portion to the Navy Department. Of course there have been changes within those assignments, but neither department has encroached upon the other.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression, very likely erroneously, that the space occupied by the State Department had been somewhat enlarged in the last few years. Under the gentleman's statement, do I understand that the Secretary of War is not authorized to give up any space that he may have or that is needed and that ought to be transferred to the State Department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Judge Advocate General has specifically held that the commission had absolutely no authority to take any space in this building from one department and give it to another.

Mr. MANN. Could the two Secretaries do it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They can not, I will state to the gentleman. In the hearings it appears there was a proposition to make some different arrangement. Two of the Secretaries—the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of State—were willing to do it; but the Secretary of War, by reason of the fact that it happened to affect one of his bureaus, objected, when the Judge Advocate General rendered an opinion that Congress had apportioned this space and that the commission had no authority whatever.

Mr. MANN. I should question very much the desirability of letting the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy throw the Secretary of War out of the building, or of letting the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War throw the Secretary of State out of the building, as would be authorized by the amendment which was offered; but it does seem to me that somebody ought to have some authority somewhere to make a change which is agreeable to all parties.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this amendment upon its face provides that the commission, or a majority of them, shall have authority to——

Mr. MANN. On its face it provides that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy may throw the Secretary of War out of the building, or the other way around. Of course, I do not apprehend that they would throw the Secretary of War himself out, but I do not know what they would do with the present hiatus in the office of Secretary of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some confusion in the mind of the gentleman who originally reserved the point of order and perhaps upon a thorough elucidation of the question he might be inclined to withdraw his point of order. I think the gentleman realizes from the statement made by the chairman that there is some need of having authority for the reapportioning of the space in this building.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. I am perfectly willing to see some authority given that way, but along the line that the committee's attention was directed to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I think that this authority ought to be given in some way whereby two of the three can not encroach upon the quarters of the other. If it is unanimous that would be fair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit? I assume the gentleman would be willing to accept the original proviso with the words in line 8 stricken out, "or a majority of the members thereof," so that it would read, "that the commission in charge may reapportion space among the departments now occupying the State, War, and Navy Building." That would require the unanimous approval of all three of the Secretaries, so there could be no possible conflict in the exercise of that authority.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not think I would object to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I submit to the chairman of the committee whether it would not be advisable to accept the suggestion.

Mr. COLLIER. I would like just a few minutes, if I can.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it came to my knowledge that the placing in of this proviso was causing much confusion, and I believe some feeling has already arisen down in that building. It seems that they are to take these 22 rooms, I believe it is, from one branch in the War Department—that of The Adjutant General—and my information is that The Adjutant General's Office, in the space allotted to that bureau, is now crowded. It appears in the record of the hearing that if The Adjutant General's Office were to take the bookcases and build them up to the ceiling, like they are in some other offices, that that would do away with some of the crowded condition——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman says it would not be advisable to have these bookcases or file cases extended up to the ceiling——

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman is mistaken. I have not said anything of the sort.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the proposition involved.

Mr. COLLIER. No; it is not the proposition. I have not yet come to it. As I understand, instead of having these cases extending to the ceiling, like in some of the other departments, in The Adjutant General's Office they have cases 6 or 7 feet high, and there is, I am told, as much weight in these rooms, by reason of having such a number of cases in aisles, with just room for clerks to go between to handle these records, as the floor can stand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Col. W. W. Harts is the present superintendent of that building, an Army engineer, who has been for many years in the service. Does the gentleman believe that Col. Harts, or any superintendent who may hereafter be appointed, and who necessarily will be an Army officer under the law, would submit a proposition to make a change that would endanger that building by reason of the weight on the floor?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi has no acquaintance with Col. Harts; but I assume that, being an officer in the Army, he knows his business, and I do not wish to cast any reflection or imputation upon him. But the point I want to bring out, gentlemen, is simply this: That as it now stands the Secretary of War may arrange and reapportion the space within his department, and so with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy; but neither one of those Secretaries has been permitted to interfere with the floor space of the others.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I want to ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman one.

Mr. COLLIER. But the gentleman has asked two to my one. However, go ahead.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman this question, and then I will be glad, of course, to answer any question he may desire to ask me. Here is a simple proposition. Boiled down, it is just this: The superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building says that if the commission is given authority to make a rearrangement of that floor space he can save this Government $6,640 by securing the use of 20 rooms——

Mr. COLLIER. Now, a second, right there.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). Without in any way interfering with the Adjutant General or with any other bureau chief in that building. Now, does not the gentleman think, in the interest of economy and the absolute necessity of providing for these 42 additional clerks in the State Department, that if this commission can make that rearrangement without injuring any service they ought to be given the right to do it?

Mr. COLLIER. I think they should if it will do that, but I want to tell this committee that the information I have received from the War Department is that it will not do that; and as I understand it, these rooms are to be taken from the Adjutant General's department. Now, these records are called upon——

Mr. SISSON. No; we do not know where the space is to be obtained.

Mr. COLLIER. Do not the hearings show that 22 are to be taken from the Adjutant General's office? My impression is that they are to be taken from the Adjutant General. My information is that these records in his office are consulted daily. I know that very few days elapse that some of us in our representative capacity do not have to write down there to get records from that department. I perhaps have had more correspondence with that branch of the War Department than any other bureau in the building, but as far as the amendment is concerned, if you would make it so that it would have to be unanimous with the three members of the commission, I think that would be all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will state my position with reference to this matter. When the matter came before our subcommittee, if you consult the hearings you will find that the examination of Col. Harts was principally conducted by myself.

I heard of absolutely no objection from either of the other three departments. I was led to believe, and did believe, that Col. Harts was stating what was the wish and desire of the department. I did not ask him a direct question as to whether he did or not. I presume I just supposed that, but if you will consult the hearings, you will find the statement made by the chairman of the committee absolutely true. But since the adoption by the committee and the publication of the bill there has been quite a controversy over this matter in the department. Now, I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to your bills, and if you will look at the proviso on page 77, I want you to note the change which was not in the bill when the subcommittee reported it to the full committee and the full committee reported it to the House. If you will follow the language in your bill, you will find that one very material clause has been left out of the amendment now being considered:

Provided, That the commission in charge, or a majority of the members thereof, may at any time reapportion space among the departments now occupying the State, War, and Navy Department Building, if the same can be done with the reduction of the amount of floor space occupied by any branch of the public service in said building, in the reduction or avoidance of public expense for rent of office or storage space for the Government, and the reduction of the number of watchmen required for said building from 40 to not more than 38.

Now, if you have followed the bill, you will find that the last clause in the bill provides that none of these departments shall be deprived of any of its space without its consent. That clause is left out. So I think the observation made by the gentleman from Illinois is a correct one.

My BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit to the gentleman that if you are going to provide in this amendment that this space shall not be secured without the consent of any official, then you might as well not pass the amendment.

Mr. SISSON. If that is true, then the subcommittee and the full committee ought not to have made the report which they make here. It says:

But such reapportionment shall in no event involve the ejectment from the building of any department, or the office or bureau of any department, now occupying the same.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is nothing in that to the effect that you have to secure the consent of the officer or the head of a bureau before space can be allotted.

Mr. SISSON. But it does mean you have got to get the consent to change a man out of a position or a bureau out of a position which he or it now occupies. And for that reason you could not eject the man, even though a majority in the War Department wanted it. You can not eject the War Department, with its valuable records.

These records are not essential to me. I want to say to you gentlemen who have a great many Union soldiers in your districts that this is most important. It does not affect me so materially, because of the use that The Adjutant General makes of all of these magnificent records, which were prepared by years of labor. They were arranged in The Adjutant General's Office so that in a moment, if you write a letter about the status of a soldier, you can get it. Gen. Ainsworth spent about 15 years in arranging those valuable records.

Now, every man from the South who wants to get the record of a Confederate soldier can do so, because those records have been arranged also; but they are not written about or asked about so much as the Union soldier.

Now, in a conversation with the present Adjutant General I asked him about how this could affect him, and he said it would disarrange all of his records. I am sure that no member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations would have advocated this if they had known there was such serious objection to the matter. It developed after the hearing of Col. Harts. I believe everything that Col. Harts said is true from his standpoint, for I have confidence in him, but I did not know at the time that there had heretofore been a controversy between him and The Adjutant General. And I do not believe that we ought to pass this item in the form of the amendment as now offered to this bill without giving the other side the right to be heard and we have all the facts. But every member of the committee felt that Col. Harts was representing the views of the commission and that no contention would arise, but that the amendment would bring about harmony in apportioning the space. And in view of the fact that the War Department has had no hearing, that the State Department has had no hearing, and that the Navy Department has had no hearing, and there is some controversy which has arisen, before it goes into effect I think the House ought to go very slowly in making this law until they shall have heard and have down in the record here a statement from these other departments as to what the purpose of this amendment is and how far it will reach. And I am unwilling, so far as I am concerned, at least, to subscribe to the amendment with the language left out with reference to the protection of the bureaus, in view of the fact that the assault is being made chiefly on The Adjutant General's Office, where these valuable records are kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The arguments that are being made are not entirely to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I desire to say that in The Adjutant General's Office there are many valuable records that have cost this Government many thousands of dollars to prepare. That office has the best kind of an arrangement, in that it is easy for the department to find the record of most soldiers, that ever served in any war in the United States. That is an important thing, and I would like to ask the chairman of this committee if in his judgment this would interfere at all with any of the records now contained in that part of the War Department Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not see how it is possible that it would do so, nor do I believe that a majority of the commission would for one moment agree to any proposition which would disturb any official or any bureau in any manner in that building.

Mr. FOSTER. I can say to the gentleman that I believe that what he says is all true, so far as he can tell, and yet there might come a time in the distribution of this space when it would crowd The Adjutant General's Office in such a way that it would disturb those records very much, and not be intended by either one of the heads of these departments.

Now, I think if the three commissioners could unanimously agree upon the apportionment of this space, there would be no objection to it, but two men might go ahead and interfere very much with the other one, so that it seems to me it would hardly be fair to permit them to do so. But with the assurance of the gentleman that this will not be done, taking his judgment in regard to it, and remembering that he has looked into it sufficiently to lead him to believe that will be case and that it would produce a saving of money, I would have no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], in which I understood him to state that his objection to this amendment was due to the fact that there had been left out of the amendment a provision inserted in the bill, which reads as follows:

Provided, That no arrangement made of space hereunder shall involve the ejectment from the building of any department or branch of the public service occupying the same.

I have absolutely no objection to the incorporation of that provision in this amendment. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by adding that language.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment before he sends his amendment down?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. That says, "office or bureau"?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify the pending amendment as indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment as modified: "Provided, That no arrangement made of space hereunder shall involve the ejectment from the building of any department or branch of the public service occupying the same."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee—and I hope we are not going to be disappointed by what may take place if this should become a law—in view of his statement that it will not disturb any of these records, because if it did I should think this $6,000 was a very small saving, or no saving, I will risk it and withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the moment. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that while I value his opinion very highly and have often gone to him for his opinion, yet his opinion in this case as to what might happen in that great department is not conclusive.

Now, I am willing to forego the point of order in the interest of the economy which the gentleman contends will be brought about to the departments down there, provided he will accept this amendment: In line 8, page 77, strike out the words "or a majority of the members thereof."

I think, gentlemen, that with the large amount of valuable records down there in the different departments, when you go to changing rooms and reapportioning space amongst those three different departments, there ought to be some sort of harmonious action. Perhaps there will be harmony among them: but when it comes to a question of our not knowing whether there will or not, and the possibility that two of the departments might get together and in what they considered to be a fair and proper spirit still reapportion those rooms in such a manner as would cause trouble and confusion, I have some misgivings, and I will ask the gentleman if he will agree to that amendment. If not, I still reserve the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the gentleman from Mississippi is not unwilling to trust the proper and fair apportionment of space in that building to two Cabinet heads and let a majority of the commission determine whether or not anything shall be done. I dare say that if this provision goes in as it is, anything that is done will be unanimous. But I do not see why any exception should be made in this case from all other cases, and why a majority should not be sufficient to settle the proposition as to whether this economy of space may or may not be had.

I want to appeal to the gentleman and say, as I have stated several times heretofore, basing my statement upon the hearings, when this matter was gone into very fully by Col. Harts, that this means a saving of over $6,000, according to the price paid for office space in buildings of that character, and unless this amendment goes in it will be up to Congress to provide for additional space for increase of force.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is clearly germane to the provision. This provision provides for fuel and light to the building, and this amendment relates to the building and its use.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question there. The Chair understands the gentleman from Mississippi, when he made his original point of order, made it to the proviso in the bill in the item on page 77, beginning line 6, "For fuel, lights, repairs, miscellaneous items, printing, and city directories, $32,000." The Chair was under that impression, and the point of order which was sustained was solely as to the proviso.

Now, the Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk has read, and the point of order is made against it by the gentleman from Mississippi that it is new legislation, and therefore is not in order on an appropriation bill.

Under the rule of the House, clause 2 of Rule XXI, known as the Holman Rule, it is in order to legislate on appropriation bills, provided the amendment—being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

The Chair thoroughly agrees with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the amendment must be germane to some provision of the bill to which it is offered. This amendment is offered to the provision of the bill dealing with fuel, lights, repairs, and miscellaneous items connected with the State, War, and Navy Department Building. The Chair therefore thinks the amendment is germane to that section of the bill.

The next question for the Chair to determine under the Holman Rule is whether or not the amendment on its face comes among the excepted class under the Holman Rule permitting legislation. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment falls within the exception, because it provides that it shall not become operative unless the watchmen paid out of the appropriation are reduced from 40 to 38, thus reducing the number of persons paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I want to amend the amendment by striking out the words "or a majority of the members thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. The gentleman from Mississippi offers to modify the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri by striking out of the amendment the following words: "or a majority of the members thereof."

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, this matter has already been discussed on its merits, and I will take up very little time. I think in the interest of harmony and good feeling this amendment should prevail. I have understood that five of the rooms which now contain valuable records of The Adjutant General are to be used for a museum, or something of that order. We have to preserve these relics, as well as the records of the War Department; but the information that I have leads me to the belief that the efficiency of The Adjutant General's Office will be very much impaired if the contemplated changes are made.

I do not care to take up the time of the committee any longer. We have discussed this for some time; and I hope my amendment will prevail, and I hope that the commission will construe this to mean that no changes will be made except by their unanimous action. I have offered it in good faith, in the interest of harmony and good feeling, and in the hope that this can be arranged in some way that will be satisfactory to all of the different heads in that department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the committee will pardon me, I want to read a portion of the hearing, so that the committee may understand this situation as it was put before the Committee on Appropriations by Col. Harts. I read from page 468 of the hearing. In speaking of this proviso, which he recommended and which is set forth here, he was asked whether or not the commission had the power now to apportion space. He said:

Yes, sir; I think so; but the decision of some of the law officers of the War Department was against it. In 1882 the building was opened for occupancy, and at that time a committee of Congress made certain assignments so that the building could be occupied. In the following year Congress created an organization, a commission, consisting of the three Secretaries—State, War, and Navy—to have supervision and care of the building, but there was no provision in the latter law that the previous assignment of space could be changed by them; therefore, when we tried to make a new arrangement recently this old act was brought out and it was said that we could not make any assignment between the different departments without the sanction of Congress. My contention was that Congress had turned that matter over to the commission under the wording "care and supervision." It seems to me that they ought to be permitted to apportion this space if they agree to it.

Now listen:

The Secretary of the Navy had a war-plan board organized and constituted to furnish plans for war for the Navy, but they had no space. One of the bureaus of the War Department has more space than the State and Navy Departments combined within 8,000 feet. We wished to secure the use of some of this room for the Navy Department, but as it meant an assignment of some of the space now occupied by some of the War Department officials this ruling requiring the sanction of Congress was held to prevent it. I found that I could obtain 20 rooms, now occupied by The Adjutant General's Office for filing, by running the file cases up to the ceiling instead of having them within the reach of a man standing on the floor. In this way I could secure all the extra space now necessary in the building. I might say further that there is ample room in the building for a good while if we could economize the space.

Mr. SISSON asked him:

What was the attitude of the three Secretaries?

Col. Harts replied:

The Secretary of the Navy was very anxious to have the assignment made. The Secretary of War did not object until he had the decision of the Judge Advocate General, and the Secretary of State also assented, with the hope that he could get some additional space for his department.

Now, I want simply to repeat that I do not see any objection to permitting the majority of this commission to determine upon the space there, especially since this amendment provides——

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice in this statement of Col. Harts that he proposes to provide additional space for the museum, so that these models of battleships may be placed in that museum, whereas now they are in the halls. May I ask the gentleman why it is that it is necessary to have this museum in that building, where they are now so crowded and where they need the space? Why not put these models in the National Museum?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I quite agree with the gentleman, and certainly my object in desiring to secure this additional space is not for the purposes of the museum. I would like to see this provision adopted, because I believe it will enable the commission to secure further room down there for these additional clerks; and so far as I am personally concerned, I would gladly accept an amendment, if the gentleman from Illinois will offer it, providing that none of this additional space shall be used for museum purposes.

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COLLIER. Is it not true that five of these rooms to be taken from The Adjutant General's Office are now filled with valuable war records, and that they are to be used for the Navy museum? I know the gentleman is more in possession of the facts than I am.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The superintendent said something about getting these models out of the corridor and putting them in some room, where they would not be in the way. I do not know what he proposes to do in reference to providing space for them in these office rooms; but as I have just stated to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], I would be more than willing, so far as I am concerned, to vote for an amendment to provide that none of this additional space shall be used for museum purposes.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman from Tennessee is willing to do that, then he admits that they do not need as many of the rooms as they thought they did, does he not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On the contrary, I am more than satisfied that they do; because, as I stated a while ago, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance came before this committee and requested an additional allowance of $5,000, because he said he did not have space for the additional draftsmen provided for in the deficiency bill. In addition to that, this bill is allowing 42 additional clerks for the State Department; and the gentleman knows that in all reason there has got to be some space provided for them, and if we can not get it for them in this building, provision may have to be made outside of the building.

Mr. COLLIER. My information is that everyone of these departments there is crowded. Is it not a fact that these departments are now renting places in different parts of the city?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is quite true.

Mr. COLLIER. This amendment then should have been brought in some time ago. If there was a great deal of room in the War Department, and it was just being used for storeroom and not needed, why did not this committee, when we were paying rent for places all over town, bring in an amendment like this some time ago?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only say to the gentleman that it is because this is the first time it was ever called to the attention of the committee; and since this has been called to the attention of the committee and the committee is now seeking to economize this space, I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not oppose the proposition. I know that there is no gentleman in the House who is more in favor of proper economy than he is or who has more consistently and ably stood for it ever since he has been a Member of this House.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to this question: When Congress creates a commission with certain powers, if no provision is made with regard to whether a majority of the commission shall act or whether it shall be by the unanimous action of the commission, is it not a fact that it requires only a majority to decide any question that comes before that commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law says a commission, and I am not so sure whether two of the commission would be held to be the commission or not.

Mr. GOOD. I think the rulings are uniform, that where a commission is established, without defining how many shall vote in favor of the proposition, that a majority vote of the commission will carry. The same thing is true in regard to the decisions of the court. I think the question is mere surplusage, and it makes no difference whether it goes out or in. If it goes out, a commission composed of three persons if two vote for a proposition and the other member of the Cabinet does not agree to it, the majority vote carries. I think there will be no question about that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If that be true, there can be no objection to leaving it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following: "Provided further, That the relics and articles of a historic character not used for or necessary to dispatch the current work of the War and Navy Department shall be removed during the fiscal year of 1917 to the National Museum."

Mr. GOOD. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order, since the Chair has held that the other amendment is in order. I will state, if the gentleman will reserve his point of order——

Mr. GOOD. I reserve it.

Mr. SISSON. That the purpose of the amendment is to prevent them from taking the five rooms mentioned in Col. Harts's testimony for the purpose of putting in models of ships that are now in the hallway. The committee discussed the matter, and decided that if the articles are to be removed—they can remain where they are under the present amendment—but that they shall not take up valuable space in a retired place where the people would never see them. It would be better to have them in the National Museum, because visitors coming to the city of Washington would naturally see them in the Museum while they would not see them in any retired space in the War and Navy Building.

Mr. GOOD. Let me ask the gentleman, Did Col. Harts make suggestion that these be removed to the National Museum?

Mr. SISSON. No; he did not.

Mr. GOOD. Did anybody?

Mr. SISSON. No.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman know what the attitude of the various departments is in regard to the matter?

Mr. SISSON. No; I only know that I am directing the amendment to prevent the movement out of the hall into some rooms or offices of these relics that are now in the hallway, as was intimated in Col. Harts's testimony. If they want them to stay in the hallway, the amendment does not prevent them from so remaining.

Mr. GOOD. As I read the amendment, it occurred to me that that was a matter that Congress ought to have some knowledge of as to the attitude of the various departments. If it is not going to result in economy, it will be an expenditure without any saving.

Mr. SISSON. There will be no expenditure under this amendment. If they are moved at all, we will save money by having them sent to the National Museum, where they have ample room for relics of that kind. That is where a part of the committee, in a private discussion, think they ought to be placed if they are moved anywhere. Under the amendment as drafted it will not compel them to move them, but if they do move them they can not take the five rooms that could be provided for offices for the relics, which would be more expensive, and, furthermore, the National Museum is anxious to have the relics there.

Mr. GOOD. The amendment says "all relics or articles of historical character not used for the necessary dispatch of current work of the War and Navy Departments shall be removed during the fiscal year."

Mr. SISSON. Perhaps that ought to be amended.

Mr. GOOD. It is mandatory that these shall be moved. I am not sure but that they ought to be removed, but I dislike to write that kind of a provision into the law without first ascertaining the attitude of the department.

Mr. SISSON. Will it be satisfactory if we write it so as to leave it discretionary with the department?

Mr. GOOD. I think they have the authority without the amendment.

Mr. SISSON. What I want to do is not to control the relics, but my purpose is to control the five rooms and say that they shall not be used for housing these model battleships and other articles that are now in the hall.

Mr. GOOD. If the amendment is modified to that extent, I will not object.

Mr. SISSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, in order to meet the objection of my friend from Iowa, who is on the committee, the Clerk has prepared another amendment, which I will read:

Provided further, That no rooms vacated under any arrangement of space hereunder shall be used for museum purposes.

Would the gentleman prefer that amendment to the one I first offered?

Mr. GOOD. I think I would, although I think the effect of it is practically the same.

Mr. SISSON. This amendment unquestionably leaves the relics where they are, and has nothing to do with their final disposition. With the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that my amendment be withdrawn and this one I have last read offered in its stead.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is withdrawn, and the gentleman offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee the following:

"Provided further, That no room vacated under any arrangement of space hereunder shall be used for museum purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Chief of Naval Operations: Chief clerk, $2,250; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 3 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each; 1 $900; telegraphers—chief $1,800, 1 $1,400, 1 $1,200, 1 $1,100; 2 assistant messengers; messenger boys—1 $600, 2 at $400 each; laborer; in all, $26,350.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 79, line 5, in lieu of the word "clast" insert the word "class."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The services of draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Steam Engineering and at rates of compensation not exceeding those paid hereunder prior to January 1, 1915, to carry into effect the various appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" and "Engineering," to be paid from the appropriation "Engineering": Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1917 shall not exceed $70,891.28. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I observe that this paragraph, or one similar thereto, which now appears under the heading of "Bureau of Steam Engineering" also appears under the headings of "Bureau of Construction and Repair," "Bureau of Ordnance," and "Bureau of Yards and Docks." May I inquire whether these appropriations have been made heretofore and in amounts similar to those here stated?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Appropriations of this character have always been made in this bill heretofore, but not in this amount. The amount named here is to conform with the estimate submitted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This paragraph authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to engage the services of draftsmen and such other technical services as may be required in the Bureau of Steam Engineering at a cost of $70,691.28. Was that the amount appropriated last year for this purpose?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; there was appropriated last year the sum of $48,300. This is an increase. The gentleman will recall, however, that in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill there was a deficiency allowed for this purpose, and the amount here appropriated for the ensuing fiscal year conforms to the amount allowed for the current year when the regular appropriation and the deficiency appropriation are taken into consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There has been some criticism of the Navy Department for not "speeding up" on the construction of vessels in the Navy heretofore authorized, and I would like to know whether provision is made here in these larger appropriations with a view to the "speeding up" of the construction of these vessels?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This appropriation includes every dollar that was asked for by the department, and it was expected, of course, that the money would be used for the employment of draftsmen to take care of the work that had been authorized, and also the work contemplated by way of construction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Without interrupting the gentleman on the reading of the subsequent paragraphs, let me inquire whether the $135,201.16 provided for in the Bureau of Construction and Repair is the same as was allowed last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; last year there was allowed the sum of $107,201.16, but in that case also a deficiency was allowed at this session of Congress, and this sum represents the sum the department really has for this year when the regular appropriation and the deficiency appropriation are both taken into consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the general discussion of the question of preparedness the construction of ships enters very largely at the present time. It has been said that Congress is sometimes behindhand in its work, but in this instance it has also been said that the department has not been altogether up to date in keeping up construction in accordance with appropriations made by Congress. If we are making increased appropriations for the purpose of giving employment to extra draftsmen to hasten work, it may answer the question I am putting to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will remember that this matter was under discussion when the deficiency appropriation bill was before the House, and it was stated then that it was the purpose and the custom of the department to provide plans and designs for work not only authorized but also for work under contemplation, and this appropriation which was asked for by the department and allowed just as asked will no doubt be used as the department may think necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Referring for the present only to this increased appropriation in the Bureau of Steam Engineering, are we to understand that it is made with a view of catching up with work already authorized or of preparing for work in the future not authorized by Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is for the necessary current work of the bureau, and that is all I can say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is only to meet the present demands?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To meet the current work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And is not in anticipation of any work yet to be done by the department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It will no doubt be used for work in the bureau, just as similar appropriations have been used in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The services of draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Construction and Repair and at rates of compensation not exceeding those paid hereunder prior to January 1, 1915, to carry into effect the various appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" and "Construction and Repair," to be paid from the appropriation "Construction and Repair": Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1917 shall not exceed $135,201.16. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is the language used in this paragraph, page 85, line 3, the same as heretofore used, "the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only," emphasizing the word "only" in the Bureau of Construction and Repair?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the same language carried in the bill heretofore.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This appropriation is for $135,201.16. What was the appropriation last year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. One hundred and seven thousand two hundred and one dollars and sixteen cents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an increase of about $28,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That contemplates the employment of extra draftsmen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Who can be employed only in the Bureau of Construction and Repair?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it intended for a speeding up of the work by the department which Congress has hitherto authorized?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the purpose of the appropriation, as I understand it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And does not contemplate work in anticipation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In so far as I am advised, this is to take care of current work of the bureau.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The presumption is that the Secretary of the Navy is alive to the necessities of the Navy at this particular time, and that he would of necessity be obliged to have plans and specifications drawn long in advance of construction of ships, and that he may not have had sufficient draftsmen for that purpose.

It is important to know whether the gentleman is providing for these extra or emergency draftsmen so that the Secretary of the Navy can prepare plans and specifications in anticipation of construction not thus far authorized by Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has always been, as I understand, the custom of the Navy Department to provide plans for certain work, such as the designing of ships, in anticipation of authorization. I believe that matter was thoroughly investigated, or, rather, thoroughly discussed when the deficiency bill was under consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I remember it was discussed, and if the gentleman will refresh his memory I think he will recall that there was a question raised on the floor as to whether the Secretary of the Navy should be permitted to employ draftsmen to prepare plans and specifications for ships not authorized by Congress.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will remember also that the statement was made that it would take several years to prepare plans.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am frank to say I did not agree with that criticism, but it was made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, if some of this work is not to be done in anticipation, then there would be an undue delay in the carrying out of the wishes of Congress in providing for extra battleships, and the appropriation is made, of course, with that end in view.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe the Secretary ought to have authority, when in his judgment he thinks it advisable, to go ahead and prepare plans and specifications, and if he thinks we ought to have ships he at least ought to be in a position to make recommendations to Congress as to the size and cost of such ships——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman and I understand no such——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But objection was made to his having draftsmen to prepare plans in advance of the authorization for the construction by Congress. Now, it would appear from this paragraph, if I understand the gentleman correctly, that they provide for draftsmen only in these respective bureaus for the purpose of catching up with work already authorized by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more in order that the gentleman may answer the question.

Mr. MANN. I would ask that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman proceed for five minutes. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is nothing in this paragraph to limit the work to be performed by these draftsmen to catch up, as the gentleman expresses it. We have put it up to the Navy Department to do as it has done in the past and provide these plans if necessary in anticipation of what will be needed, and certainly there is nothing in this paragraph to prevent these draftsmen being employed in that way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell us what are the facts? May these draftsmen be employed in the preparation of plans for vessels in the future, not authorized by Congress, or will they be employed exclusively upon work that has been delayed and which Congress has already authorized?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think these draftsmen are expected to be used in the drafting of plans for ships which in the future may be authorized by Congress in order to keep the work reasonably current and to enable those ships to be constructed within a reasonable time, just as has been the custom heretofore in the Navy Department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This illustrates to the gentleman what I am trying to impress upon him. A battleship is being constructed in the navy yard at New York. Another battleship has been authorized by Congress to be constructed in that same navy yard. It is obvious with only one building ways there capable of holding a battleship that the battleship under construction must be gotten out before work upon the new battleship can be commenced. Now, the department evidently has plans for this new battleship and it needs draftsmen as well to dispose of questions that might arise in respect to plans for the old battleships. It is evident that this country needs a few more battleships. Now, will these draftsmen be employed exclusively upon the battleship that is now on the ways and upon the battleship that has been authorized to go upon the ways, or will the Secretary of the Navy be permitted to use these men for work upon plans for ships that he has in contemplation and for which Congress has not yet made an authorization?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I so understand. I do not think the matter was gone into at any great length before the committee, but it was stated that it is necessary always to provide plans for battleships in advance or in anticipation of their construction in order to keep pace with modern naval architecture, so as to get the work out and have the ships completed within a reasonable time after they were authorized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell us, as a result of the hearings before his committee, whether we are actually behind in the matter of draftsmen to do work upon ships authorized by Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not say that we are. There was necessity for an additional appropriation for the current year in anticipation of an increase in armament, as the gentleman will recall, but, in so far as the normal situation is concerned, I am not prepared to say that the Navy Department has not been supplied with all appropriations necessary for draftsmen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apparently the Navy Department is behind in the construction of a number of ships that have been authorized by Congress, and if it needs more draftsmen I would like to see it get as many draftsmen as may be necessary to bring the work up to date.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee has allowed to the Navy Department every dollar that was asked for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is obvious to the gentleman, I am sure, as it would be to anybody, that if war should be declared against this country to-morrow, or in a week, or next year, we would not be in a position to use many of the battleships and smaller naval vessels authorized by Congress which are under construction or have not been commenced.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If that should unfortunately be the case, the Committee on Appropriations could not be held responsible, because, as I have just stated, it has allowed every dollar that the department has asked for in the way of draftsmen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee has granted in these two paragraphs that have been read all the money asked for by the Navy Department for draftsmen to go ahead with plans and specifications for new battleships?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. What authorization has been made for ships to be built in Philadelphia?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I cheerfully yield.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to use the term "speeding up." I had thought I knew in a general way what the term meant. But in the sense the gentleman used it I was not able to catch it immediately, because the ordinary meaning, I understand, has no application to anything that is being done in this House or in the Navy Department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman as to that. I do not think we shall settle the European war here to-day; but it does seem as if, "with the sparks flying around us," as indicated two weeks ago, it is an anomalous condition to find ourselves awaiting the construction of numerous ships that Congress has authorized.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not think that they are "speeding up" as to them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. But if the department has now come forward to ask for money to get sufficient draftsmen in order "to get a move on" for the construction of these ships, I think it is a good thing.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I can relieve the mind of the gentleman from Philadelphia and satisfy the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] by telling him that according to history and tradition "speeding up" is a term that originated in Philadelphia and is characteristic of things in Philadelphia.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true by imputation as applied to the Navy Department and to this House at present.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the difference between the Democratic Party, which the gentleman from Georgia represents, and the city of Philadelphia, which I, in part, represent, is that Philadelphia believes in action while the Democratic Party relies upon history and tradition. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, although the debate on this amendment is exhausted under the rules, it would be cruel to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and to myself, and unjust to the public and to posterity, if we should allow such a radiant gem that has just scintillated from the brain of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania to go without an appropriate setting. Therefore I wish to say in answer to his statement that Philadelphia believes in "speeding up"; that a mere matter of belief will not answer, for "faith without works is dead." I shall not attempt to refer to his remarks derogatory to the Democratic Party, nor anything said in the brilliant colloquy between him and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] derogatory to the good name and efficiency of our most excellent Navy. I wish to talk about something that is nonpartisan, and it is singularly appropriate just at this time.

Two questions have been forced upon our attention when there should have been none, if all minds had started out with the correct premise that the President is charged by the Constitution with rsponsibility for our diplomatic affairs concerning the foreign relations of the country, and that Congress has no concern therewith until the time should arrive, if, unfortunately, it ever should, when the President would put the matter up to Congress and ask for legislative action. That time had not arrived when volunteer agitation arose in the two Houses in a manner calculated to embarrass and cripple the negotiations and action of the Executive and encourage the other nations to hold out against his contention. Thus has been brought about a situation liable to prove not only embarrassing to the administration but disastrous to the country. Considering the constitutional duties of the President in the premises and the entire absence of the duty or propriety on the part of Congress to interfere therewith, it amounts almost to sedition or treason not only to fail to support the administration but actually to antagonize to such an extent as to persuade foreign nations that we are not sincere, that we are not in earnest, that the attitude of the President is not supported by Congress or the people, and therefore may be despised and treated with contempt.

In my judgment, the surest way to precipitate trouble for our country is for any considerable number of Congressmen or people to persist in that attitude of antagonism to the President. The surest way to continue our peaceful relations with the world, maintain our absolute neutrality, and preserve the prosperity of our people is for Congress to abstain from interference with the rightful functions of the Executive and permit him, as he has successfully done for the past 18 months, to conduct the foreign affairs of this Government, protect the rights of American citizens on the high seas, without complicity or participation in the devastating war ravaging Europe. Those who would interfere with his prerogatives now would rob the country of the blessings consequent upon the consistent and triumphant course of the President during the past 18 months in avoiding complications through the exercise of consummate wisdom and statesmanship.

The other proposition which, operating on the minds of certain honest Members and people, causes the antagonism is the unnecessary and erroneous consideration of the merits of the case. Gentlemen do not discriminate between the indiscretion of riding upon ships of belligerent nations, on the one hand, and on the other hand the absolute right of men who from sheer necessity are compelled to take occasional passage upon such ships. The prevalent idea that all such ships are crowded, cabin and decks, with joy riders sailing over the waters to enjoy the carnage on the other side is wide of the truth. Very few people take such risks at this time and in almost every case it is absolutely necessary to make such a voyage and the ships of the belligerents may afford the only opportunity. Their proposition is that we will declare in advance that if our people ride on such ships and are killed this Government will not be responsible therefor, or, rather, that if they ride on such ships this Government will not extend its protection to its own citizens and preserve to them their rights. Such a position is intolerable and indefensible. Common sense advises against such a dangerous passage because such passage being taken in the exercise of an international and inalienable right, if followed by injury may involve this Government in trouble because the Government would feel under obligations to take cognizance of an injury to its citizen. To announce in advance that this Government will not call to account the attempts of any nation to destroy the lives of its citizens on the high seas on such ships would be to issue a wholesale license in advance for the destruction of the lives of American citizens. To do such a thing would disgrace this country and every person living therein. It would be a blot upon the fair escutcheon of this country such as has not darkened the fame of any civilized nation since the dawn of history.

But we come to the second proposition, and that is, gentlemen who started this agitation are interfering with the Executive by contending that if a liner carries any armament that it is a warship and subject to be treated like a warship, and that any passenger thereon may go to his doom regardless of his nationality without any redress from his Government because the ship was armed and was therefore a battleship and therefore not entitled to notice and visitation before destruction. While I deny that it is proper to debate the merit of that question in this House at this time and insist that it is still a question for diplomacy, yet gentlemen should recognize the doctrine well established for centuries, to wit: Our rights upon the high seas are exactly identical, unchanging through war and through peace, except where abridged by an effective blockade. Belligerent nations when they fight upon the high seas must limit their fighting to one another and are compelled so to act as to do no harm to neutrals and noncombatants. If they fight, their fight must be so conducted as not to interfere with the rights of neutrals and noncombatants to sail the seas and trade and traffic just as in times of peace.

Then our friends should bear in mind the true difference, equally well established, between liners, on the one hand, and warships on the other. A merchantman or liner devoted to commerce, laden with freight and passengers, hastens from one port to another port. It seeks a port in order to close the traffic of the trip, land its passengers and freight, and collect its revenues. It is not out hunting an enemy. If nobody attacks it, nobody is harmed. There is no belligerency, and it is in such a hurry that if it is taken at all the enemy must be alert and expeditious. On the other hand, a warship takes to the water without freight or passengers, but armed and panoplied to seek a fight, and it sails over the briny deep in quest of any enemy. It seeks to choose a time and place of battle. It is bent on war and nothing but war. The distinction is as great as the distance between the two poles, and under an inalienable and indefeasible time-honored international right American citizens may take passage on any merchantman, although it is carrying some arms for use in contingencies in case it is attacked from any quarter by any character of assailants. But the contention that the arms on a merchantman are intended for offensive, intended to enable the ship to go out and hunt a fight, is contrary to human experience and human history and can find no countenance in human reason.

Our country for 18 years has escaped the burden and horror of war through the exercise of Executive prerogatives by a President in whom we repose implicit confidence, and never was there any doubt or difficulty about his continuing to lead us successfully through the dangers lurking on every hand until this volunteer suggestion of interference began to be heard here and elsewhere. It is not too late yet for all patriots to unite, withdraw all suggestions from the Executive, hold up his hands, and leave him free to conduct his diplomacy according to his wisdom and integrity, which, in my judgment, is our sure road to safety.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The services of clerks, draftsmen, and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Ordnance, and at rates of compensation not exceeding those paid hereunder prior to January 1, 1915, to carry into effect the various appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" and "Ordnance and ordnance stores," to be paid from the appropriation "Ordnance and ordnance stores": Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1917 shall not exceed $13,283.76. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each, shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The appropriation for the services of clerks, draftsmen, and so forth, for the Bureau of Ordnance is fixed in this paragraph at $13,283.76. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] tell us what was appropriated for this purpose last year? I want to find out if it is an increase or a decrease.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no change in the paragraph to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then apparently there is no necessity for "speeding up" in the Bureau of Ordnance in the matter of extra clerks and draftsmen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I assume not. There is no increase asked for by the department.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The services of skilled draftsmen and such other technical services as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary may be employed only in the Bureau of Yards and Docks to carry into effect the various appropriations and allotments thereunder and be paid from such appropriations and allotments: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year 1917 shall not exceed $50,000. A statement of the persons employed hereunder, their duties, and the compensation paid to each shall be made to Congress each year in the annual estimates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The appropriation for the services of skilled draftsmen, and so forth, in the Bureau of Yards and Docks being fixed in this paragraph at $50,000, I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether that is an increase or decrease?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is no increase. It is the same amount that was allowed for the current year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the department did not think it necessary to ask for any more assistants in the Bureau of Yards and Docks for the current year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, drawing materials, horses and wagons to be used only for official purposes, including rental of stable; purchase, maintenance, repair, or operation of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, street car tickets not exceeding $250, freight, expressage, postage, typewriters and computing machines and exchange of same, and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $42,000; it shall not be lawful to expend, for any of the offices or bureaus of the Navy Department at Washington, any sum out of appropriations made for the Naval Establishment for any of the purposes mentioned or authorized in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the Navy Department now under this appropriation rent a stable?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; under the present law they rent a stable and pay it out of this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. What is the need, then, for providing in here for rental of stable? This item, I think, for the first time includes by language the rental of a stable. I do not know whether it is something new or whether it would cover something which already has been done and about which there was a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This explanation was made of that: It was stated to the committee that the Secretary of the Navy formerly rented a residence which was supplied with a stable.

Mr. MANN. Rented a what?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The residence was supplied with a stable or barn for his horses, and it was used for stabling the Government horses used by him. But he has no such home now, and it is necessary, of course, to rent a stable or barn for these horses. They are now being kept in a livery stable.

Mr. MANN. Why is that not the place to keep them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because it is thought that it would be much cheaper to keep them in a stable rented for that purpose. The statement is made that when horses are placed in a livery stable they are likely to become affected with all sorts of diseases.

Mr. MANN. They are not worried about that. They do not want to save the horses.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They state that this will not only save expense but will save veterinary bills in the end.

Mr. MANN. Of course if you rent a private stable for the use of the Secretary of the Navy, you must do it for all the other Secretaries. You talk about the saving of expense. You certainly know that is not correct.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This does not increase the appropriation to any extent.

Mr. MANN. Oh, only $2,000. That is not very much. It is just a couple of thousand dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The increase of $2,000 was not due to this particular reason.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I suppose they did not put it on that ground. I presume it does not cost anything more, theoretically. Now, if this particular Secretary is to have a private stable, every other Secretary must have a private stable, and also a man to take care of it, all at the Government expense. They will have to have two or three men to take care of the stable, besides a driver and a coachman and liveried footmen. That is all proper; I have no complaint. But it would be a great deal cheaper to buy these gentlemen automobiles and keep them at a garage, and a great deal more comfortable to them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know. We are confronted with the proposition of buying another automobile now for the only department that is authorized to use one.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I suppose it is for the Department of Labor. I have a memorandum here of their expenses at the garage. The amount is a little more than I would want to pay, and yet it is not as much as it would cost to keep a stable. What can you rent a stable for and maintain it for, convenient to the Secretary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not say; but the statement was made to the committee that the Government horses could be placed in a private rented stable and maintained much more cheaply than they could be maintained in a livery stable.

Mr. MANN. Well, there are livery stables that practically live on governmental patronage, and they do the service well, I assume. Of course, I do not know anything about it from personal observation, but they do look after those horses satisfactorily, I think. Of course, I suppose it is a little nicer to have a private stable and a public official to take care of it than it is to economize and get the work done for a little less money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The State Department has been authorized to rent a stable for quite a number of years, and uses a privately rented stable for the care and upkeep of their horses.

Mr. MANN. I do not for the moment catch the eye of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], but I gather from my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], that if we could persuade the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to tell about the expenses of the State Department about maintaining its horses, the gentleman would not want this department to follow their example. As I recollect it, we used to pay $150 or $250 a year just for shoeing a horse for the State Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In order that the gentleman from Illinois shall not gather the idea that this $2,000 allowed under this item is for rent of a stable, I want to say that the increase was made to take care of the new Bureau of Naval Operations and the necessary extra expenses that will be incurred in the purchase of stationery and contingent expenses on that account.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have no objection to the purchase of stationery, and there is not much difference in some respects between stationery and stables. They sound almost alike, and it is just as easy to spend money for stationery as it is to spend it for stables, and it is just as easy to ask for stationery as for a stable. It is all in a lump sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. How much per month is it proposed to pay for the use of a stable? Or is it proposed to build one?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; they propose to rent a stable, and it is stated to the committee that they propose to rent a stable near the department building at much less than the expense at which they could put the horses in a livery stable, which costs $25 per month each.

Mr. MADDEN. I know that I rent a private garage for two machines at $6 a month. I do not know whether they would be willing to rent as ordinary a place as that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that this item was asked for by the Navy Department for reasons of economy. They said they could save money if they rented a stable.

Mr. MADDEN. They ought to be required to say how much money they are going to pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department, $33,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest items of annual expense to the Federal Government is the rent which it pays for additional quarters in the District of Columbia. I have not before me at this time the aggregate of the amount that we are paying to private landowners in the District of Columbia for additional office space for governmental offices, but this $33,000 item for the Navy Department is only one item of that kind. Every time a new bureau is created or a new branch of activity of the Federal Government is created, it is necessary to find office space in the District of Columbia for that bureau. Office space is not always easy to be had, especially in the quantity and in the location and with the facilities necessary for a Government office of considerable size. When we created the Department of Labor we had a great deal of difficulty in getting suitable quarters. Recently, when we created the Federal Trade Commission, we had difficulty in getting suitable quarters, and on each of these occasions and annually the committees of Congress and Congress itself face every possible device of extortion on the part of owners of property in the District of Columbia to force the Government into a position where it must rent more space, and must rent it on the terms of the man who happens to have the space at that moment to offer.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that if we have a large number of people in the employ of the Government doing a short day's work, we need more office space and more desk room than if we had a proper number of people working a full day of eight hours. This is only one of the ways in which money leaks out of the Federal Treasury and leaks into the pockets of the great landowning, real estate speculating class in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a moment I will. It is not surprising that men with that interest at stake, enough interest to enable them to build great buildings in this city for the very purpose of renting space for the Federal offices, and who seek to hold the Government up by the most extortionate demands when we need the space—it is not to be wondered at that those men can raise a very large fund to employ newspaper writers of nation-wide reputation to fight any proposition in the interest of the taxpayers of the Nation, such as the proposition to make Government clerks work a full day of eight hours and thus reduce the number necessary to be employed. There is not a single doubt in the minds of any member of this committee but that the interests of the great landowning and real estate speculating class of the District of Columbia are diametrically opposed to the interests of the taxpayers of the Nation. The men who pay the taxes throughout the Nation must pay for the additional space rented in the District of Columbia, and the men who have the additional space to rent are not only anxious that the taxpayers shall pay for more space but they are anxious that they shall pay for a larger number of people to do the same work than would be employed in private business enterprises honestly and efficiently conducted.

Mr. MADDEN. How much additional space would be placed at the disposal of the department without the payment of additional rent if the eight-hour plan suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] should go into effect?

Mr. BORLAND. How much additional space would be placed at the disposal of the department by whom? Not a foot of additional space would be placed at the disposal of the department by any of the pecuniary patriots of the District of Columbia. We would pay for every foot of space we got. There would not be a single foot placed at our disposal by these patriots who are appealing to Congress to-day; but the amount of space that would be saved, that really would be utilized for the work of the department, would be approximately equal to one-eighth of the space that we now occupy. It will take approximately seven persons to do the work now done by eight. It will take approximately seven office rooms to house the people now housed in eight office rooms. It will take approximately $700,000 to pay the bill instead of $800,000. You can figure it out by the simple rules of arithmetic. But there would be more saving in money than that, because all the saving in space would go to reduce the outside space which the Government is not obliged to rent.

Mr. MADDEN. So the gentleman thinks that if his eight-hour amendment is adopted one room out of every eight now in use will be vacated and available for other uses.

Mr. BORLAND. I say approximately that; yes. I do not doubt but what there is a variation in different departments. I do not assume that is going to be a mathematical result. No man does. But that there is going to be a difference in the amount of space required by the Federal Government to house its extra employees and a difference to the pockets of the real estate speculators in the District of Columbia is as clear as sunlight to me. That is only one of the ways in which this thing appeals to the great landowning class of the District of Columbia. These gentlemen who think that they are bidding for any popularity by sustaining the claims of the real estate speculators in the District of Columbia as against the tax-paying citizens of the Nation will take care to recollect that when this vote comes there will not be any chance for a technicality. It will be a square fight as to whether the taxpayer of the Nation is entitled or not entitled to a square deal.

Gentlemen talk here very learnedly about $6 a month extra expense to the Government to rent a stable. Why, bless your souls, that is not a marker to the problems that are faced by the Committee on Appropriation of this House every year.

Mr. MADDEN. I told what I was paying. I did not say what the department was paying.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know whether this particular stable that the gentleman was so much interested in will cost $6 a month or $60 a month.

Mr. MADDEN. Neither do I.

Mr. BORLAND. But I take it for granted that it will not cost as much as the time of this House that the gentleman spent on it has cost. But here is an item which is an annual item, growing every time we create a great public activity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is driven pretty hard when, in order to give support to the amendment on which he got snap judgment in the committee, he has to make an attack upon the real estate agents of this city and make the bald charge that they are holding up the Government in the rents that are being paid by the Government for the use of departmental service. The question of rental of these buildings in the city has received consideration by the subcommittee, and in this bill we authorize the Secretary of Labor and the Attorney General to enter into leases based upon the rate of 36.3 cents per square foot of available space used.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, let me ask the gentleman to yield to me at that point. Why did you limit that to 36.3 cents per square foot if it was not that you and your committee had gone through a long fight on the subject of extortion here? Why did you limit the amount?

Mr. STAFFORD. We limited that to 36.3 cents a square foot not because we had been through a long fight, but because the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, testified before the committee that it was but a fair return on the investment and that it was a very low rental for office buildings in the District. Now, what is shown by the figures in the Book of Estimates, showing the returns of rentals paid by the various departments? By reason of the growing departmental service we have been obliged to rent offices in the Woodward Building, in the Union Trust Building, and in the Southern Building, where the rental is $1.35 per square foot, including upkeep, janitor service, and elevator service, whereas in the Department of Commerce we pay 36.3 cents per square foot for the use of the available space, and are obliged to maintain the upkeep.

Secretary Redfield testifies that that upkeep, including everything, amounts to 18½ cents per square foot, or a total for that building of 54.8, thus saving more than one-half of what is being charged to the general public in the rent of office buildings. Yet the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], driven to the extreme to find some reason for bolstering up his amendment, claims that the question of rental is involved in compelling the clerks to work eight hours instead of seven. Apparently he does not know that throughout the country, even in private establishments, clerks are not required to work a maximum of eight hours; that in many insurance companies and banks the maximum is seven and one-half and in some instances seven hours. If there is merit in his proposition, let us discuss the question on its merits, but do not let us drag into this discussion an arraignment of a class who do not deserve to be attacked on the showing that is made. I do not link real estate agents with land sharks or money sharks. They perform a necessary function, and they have submitted to the department heads fair proposals as to the erection of new buildings, to be rented for a term of five years on the basis of 36.3 cents per square foot. That rental in some instances does not yield the owners an average of 4 per cent on the amount invested. If it does not yield a return of 4 per cent, even excluding taxes, certainly no one can charge that the real estate agents are engaged in a holdup policy of the Government in the rental of offices, to accommodate the respective branches of the Government by reason of the growing needs of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: Commissioner, $5,000; deputy commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,500; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; 2 qualified surgeons, at $2,000 each; 11 medical examiners, at $1,800 each; 7 chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,250; chief of board of review, $2,250; 39 principal examiners, at $2,000 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, $2,000; 11 assistant chiefs of divisions, at $1,800 each; 3 stenographers, at $1,600 each; disbursing clerk for the payment of pensions, $4,000; deputy disbursing clerk, $2,750; 3 supervising clerks in the disbursing division, at $2,000 each; clerks—99 of class 4, 89 of class 3, 264 of class 2, 334 of class 1, 70 at $1,000 each; 40 copyists; 29 messengers; 11 assistant messengers; 2 skilled laborers, at $660 each; 12 messenger boys, at $400 each; superintendent of building, $1,400; 23 laborers; 10 female laborers, at $400 each; 15 charwomen; painter and cabinetmaker, skilled in their trades, at $900 each; captain of the watch, $840; 3 sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; 19 watchmen; engineer, $1,200; 2 firemen: in all, $1,458,790.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 94, line 17, by striking out the word "seven" and inserting the word "eight."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 94, line 17, strike out the word "seven" before the word "chiefs" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee recognizes that this amendment ought to be agreed to, and I understand will make no objection. The bureau as constituted contains eight divisions, and, evidently by accident, only seven chiefs were provided for. I understand that the gentleman in charge of the bill will make no contention against this.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that the Commissioner of Pensions presented to the committee a statement showing the vacancies existing in the bureau, vacancies which he had authority to fill but had not filled, and among them was an assistant chief of division. The committee felt that inasmuch as the vacancy existed and the commissioner had not considered that it was necessary to fill it, there was no reason for making an appropriation for it.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand—I have not seen the paper the gentleman is reading from, but I understand from gentlemen over there that this chief is necessarily needed because there are eight divisions and only seven chiefs, and evidently there was some misunderstanding about it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield a moment.

Mr. RUCKER. I will yield.

Mr. SISSON. My understanding is that there must have been some confusion about it, for the reason that in presenting the list of vacancies it was stated that one of the chiefs had died or removed or had resigned and the vacancy was reported. I can not recall that the department desired it be not filled, but under the law could not fill it, and there seems to have been some confusion or misunderstanding. I have talked with gentlemen of the Pension Office, and they all say that they want this particular place filled, but in reporting the vacancy here they did not state to the committee that they wanted the vacancy filled. Now they say they do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only state that the committee acted upon the report submitted by the Commissioner of Pensions at the request of the committee. They made the statement that on June 30, 1915, there was among other vacancies one assistant chief of division, at $1,800, and that that vacancy, as shown by the report submitted to the committee, still existed February 11, 1916. This being a vacancy which had existed for more than seven months, the committee naturally came to the conclusion that it was not necessary to fill it.

Mr. RUCKER. What vacancy is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Assistant chief of division.

Mr. RUCKER. That is not what my amendment applies to. It is a chief of division.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, there is a chief of division also at $2,000. That vacancy existed June 30, 1915, and it had not been filled on February 11, 1916.

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that I will get into no controversy with him about this, but I talked with gentlemen connected with the service to-day, and I am assured that it is absolutely necessary to have this place provided for if the department is to render efficient service.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. The Commissioner of Pensions, as we all know, is at the present time necessarily absent at the bedside of his son, who is in a very serious condition. The Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, with whom I have talked, says that there are eight divisions in the department, and they need a chief for each division. Therefore they need eight men in place of seven, as provided in this bill. I have been informed to-day that unless this bill provides for eight men the department will be compelled to reorganize their entire system of operation or disarrange the entire machinery of that office. It is plain as it can be that the position which the chairman has referred to is the chief of division, and unless we want to disorganize the entire machinery of the Pension Department, which I think is about the best organized bureau we have in the entire service of the Government, we must fill this vacancy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman from Ohio says that they have eight divisions. I understand that to be the fact. Of course the committee had no intention of depriving the Pension Bureau of any necessary force, but I say that the Committee on Appropriations acted solely under the statement which was submitted to it, and which I hold in my hand for the inspection of any gentleman, showing that the vacancy of the chief of one division at $2,000 had existed from June 30, 1915, down to February 11, 1916, and still exists. I can not understand why, with these eight divisions, they permitted that vacancy to exist more than seven months.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not know what the paper is that the gentleman refers to——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is the report submitted by the Commissioner of Pensions, and brought by him personally to the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. I have not seen it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Missouri thinks, and will so state, that having eight divisions in the Pension Bureau, to eliminate one of the chiefs of division will seriously interfere with the organization of that bureau, the committee I am quite sure would not object to his amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. I can not and will not make that statement.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have talked with a gentleman in a position to know, and he says that they have eight divisions and that each one had a chief, and that there was a vacancy in one of these divisions which under the law he could not fill because he could only fill 25 per cent, and you could not put a quarter of a man into this position. You have to put a whole man in, so that was not called to the attention of the subcommittee at all, and the report made, which the chairman of the committee read a moment ago, was the report upon which the committee acted. In that way that chief was left out, and I believe the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] is absolutely what will occur unless this chief is given. They have an $1,800 man, as I am informed, who has been acting as chief of that division.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 95, line 4, by striking out "twenty-nine" and inserting "thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 4, strike out the word "twenty-nine" and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I would as well make a statement now as later, in order to be frank with the House and to explain my activity here to-day. The deputy commissioner of pensions, a gentleman from my district, was with me for a great many years after I came to Washington. During the absence of the commissioner, who has been, as stated, necessarily out of the city, the deputy commissioner feels some responsibility resting upon him, and most naturally he has appealed to me. The amendment now pending is simply to restore one messenger. There are 30 in the service provided for by existing law, and the committee recommended 29. In a talk with the deputy commissioner to-day he said that in his judgment, for efficient service in that bureau, the one stricken out should be restored, so that the department shall have 30 messengers as it has now. I am not going to consume the time of the House very long upon this amendment. I say to you seriously that I believe it ought to be agreed, because those in authority and charged with the responsibility of administering the duties of that office, and in whom I have great confidence, absolute confidence, say it is essential. I have seen here this evening a question upon which gentlemen very seriously differed as to whether it cost or is worth $120 or $240 to run one of these darned machines that disturbs the peace of everybody, and by almost a unanimous vote the House decided that the man who runs the machine was best qualified to tell what it costs to run it. If that is true with respect to running a motor cycle, I take it that gentlemen will hardly question the integrity or judgment of a trusted officer who says that this place ought to be restored.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the committee in reducing the number of messengers in the Pension Bureau acted on the assumption that if there was a vacancy in the position of messenger existing in the bureau since June 30, 1915, up until and including February 11, 1916, there was certainly no reason why that position should be continued into the next fiscal year. As I stated a while ago, the committee requested the Commissioner of Pensions to file with the committee a statement showing what vacancies existed in the bureau on June 30, 1915, the close of the last fiscal year, and what vacancies existed in the bureau on the date on which the information was asked, and the commissioner in person appeared before the committee and brought these two papers or reports, which show that upon June 30, 1915, there was a vacancy in the office of Commissioner of Pensions of one messenger at $840, and that on February 11, 1916, that vacancy still existed. I can not understand why, if that be true, and it is because we got our information from the commissioner himself, it should be necessary to make provision for this messenger during the next year. Certainly, if they need him, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] insists, they would have filled that position very quickly after the vacancy occurred last year. It is entirely a different proposition from that of the chief of a division. I can realize that if they have eight divisions in the bureau and drop one of them it would necessarily entail an entire reorganization of the bureau; but not so in the case of a messenger.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. It is true that the current law provides for 30 messengers.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. RUCKER. The bureau, the gentleman says, left the place vacant.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. According to the report submitted to the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. Hence, they have not uselessly or needlessly used any public money there, because, under the bill, money not used of course reverts to the Treasury; and let me suggest to the gentleman the fact, which possibly he does not know or at least has not thought of, because the gentleman is very well informed about most everything—and I am going to be plain about it—that that particular bureau has been the place where a certain class of old citizens of this country have to a large number been assigned.

These grades or classes down there now are occupied not by college graduates of yesterday but by old men who gained their distinction many, many years ago. These men are becoming infirm, and necessarily it becomes important at times to change to younger men in order to have efficient work, and that makes it necessary to reduce some of the older ones. I say to the gentleman frankly that the Deputy Commissioner of Pensions wants this place restored in order that he may take care of men who may be driven out of that building into the highways, if he is not given the opportunity to take care of them. Now, if the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, I will get him more time, all the time he wants, with his assistance——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is all right.

Mr. RUCKER. Take the situation that exists down there. There are a great many gentlemen holding positions there with the approval of every man on this floor, and yet they are not the most efficient clerks in the departmental service in Washington; but they are there, and the Deputy Commissioner of Pensions says if anything happens to those people it must be the result of legislation here; and I want to call the gentleman's attention to it and to plead with him and with the committee to be fair, and to plead with the committee not to embarrass that department; but with the fact admitted, as proclaimed by the gentleman from Tennessee, that these places have not been used when not needed, to let that bureau and the men in charge of it have the same latitude during this year they had last year because there are a whole lot of people there who are one year older at this time than they were last year.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will if I have the floor. I think the gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GOOD. The committee has already restored the one chief of division for whom we failed to make provision. Now, as I understand the gentleman, instead of providing for 29 messengers we should provide for 30?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; and some other amendments which I have to offer.

Mr. GOOD. If that were agreed to, does the gentleman think that even then the Pension Bureau would have sufficient force to carry on its work?

Mr. RUCKER. I think we would have enough messengers.

Mr. GOOD. But I am not asking about messengers; I mean the entire force. Of course, the gentleman understands these messengers perform various services.

Mr. RUCKER. I will be frank with the gentleman and say I have some other amendments which I wish to offer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To increase the force?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; to increase the force, not above what it is now but above what the bill provides for.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, this is the situation that confronts the Commissioner of Pensions, and I want to say that I do not think that since we have had a Pension Department we have ever had a more competent and efficient commissioner than the present Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Saltzgaber, nor one who has given more universal satisfaction to the old soldiers throughout the country, or who has caused the administration under which he serves less trouble or anxiety.

Now, this is the situation that confronts him there. He has about 260 very old soldiers and soldiers' widows in the department who can render very little service. Now, the moment that one of these should be dropped the country would ring with denunciations of that department. So far he has escaped criticism on that line. Now, if we take away any of these positions, when an emergency arises where the soldier or the soldier's widow has reached that age and physical condition where they are unable to perform the duties required of them in their present position, he has no place to give this soldier or soldier's widow where they can perform some simple service such as keeping a card index or open the mail or some suitable, easy work of that kind. Personally, I do not want to see any position abolished that will take a place from any old, feeble soldier or soldier's widow. And if we begin to bear down and cut out places of this kind we put him right up against the hard proposition of having no place, although his desire strongly is to take care of them. We take from him the opportunity to take care of some old dependent soldier or soldier's widow, and it is for that purpose and reason that we are asking that all these places be retained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 21, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I will say, as seriously as ever I made a statement in my life, that I do not want to obstruct the work of this committee, but I realize that a majority of those who are present and heard the colloquy that has taken place here between us, voted for the amendment, and those who came in without knowing what was before the committee voted against it; and so I am compelled to ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is rather late, but the Chair will entertain the motion. The gentleman has been given unanimous consent to address the committee. The gentleman from Missouri asks for tellers.

Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, if the Chair will pardon me just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. I believe, if the Chair will indulge me a moment, that we can fix an amendment here that will be agreed to and save time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] offer an amendment?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 95, line 4, by striking out the word "eleven" and inserting "thirteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 95, line 4, strike out the word "eleven" and insert "thirteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no debate required on that. I think there will be no controversy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just a minute. I would like to rise in opposition to the amendment. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether any tacit agreement has been had between him and the gentleman from Missouri as to increasing these places.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is none except with reference to these assistant messengers. The gentleman asks for 15.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask for two additional to what you have given.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know; but you propose to ask for four, and in view of the statement he made with reference to the messengers, I thought possibly——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Missouri take the House into his confidence as to the amendment he proposes to the other personnel in this item?

Mr. RUCKER. Unquestionably, Mr. Chairman. After conference with the deputy commissioner I came here to press as hard as I could an amendment so as to give 15 instead of 11 assistant messengers and 12 instead of 2 skilled laborers and 16 instead of 12 messenger boys. And after the conference I have had with the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman, in charge of the bill, I have suggested to him that I would agree to 13 instead of 15 assistant messengers—on line 4—and that is the amendment pending now. And I suggest that I would agree to 14 instead of 16 messenger boys, and out of the goodness of my heart I said to the gentleman that I would accept the number he suggested of skilled laborers, hoping that he would make it not less than 10.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill here provides but 2.

Mr. RUCKER. The bill provides for 2. The deputy commissioner told me he ought to have 12, but I have submitted it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and will accept without complaint whatever number he may suggest.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course I have no authority to accept any amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, then, the tacit understanding is merely as to the assistant messengers?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RUCKER. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is the cause of such a radical difference between the original report of the committee and the commissioner as to the number of these?

Mr. RUCKER. I presume, if the gentleman will permit me to indulge in speculation somewhat, that in some respects this controversy arises out of the fact that a great many of these places are not to-day filled and have not been filled, but that is not costing the Government anything. The commissioner wants these places in order to take care of people from time to time who must be assigned to less laborious work.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. FESS. How many skilled laborers were provided for last year?

Mr. RUCKER. Thirty, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Seventeen is the number of messengers authorized in existing law, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the chairman in charge of the bill that the House meets at 10 o'clock to-morrow, and that some of us have a little work to do in reference to the bills that will come up to-morrow. It is now about 5 o'clock, or will be before the House can adjourn, and I think it would be well to let these matters go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman's suggestion is well taken. I hope that to-morrow we shall be able to dispose of the bill during the day. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MARKETING OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document 5,000 copies of the proceedings of a conference relative to the marketing of live stock, the distribution of meats, and related matters, conducted by the Office of Markets and Rural Organization in the Department of Agriculture at the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, November 15 and 16, 1915. I will say that this is the conference conducted by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, in cooperation with the live-stock associations of the United States at Chicago in the last 60 days, and this contains reports on the condition of the live-stock market up to the present time. In my opinion it is a very valuable document, particularly for the use of the Members of this House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman confident that the printing can be done within the limit of $500? Of course the House can not by a simple resolution order the printing unless it costs less than $500.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I think it can. I will ask for the maximum, $500, and if that does not supply the 5,000 copies we will have to renew the request. I think 5,000 copies can be printed.

Mr. MANN. That would amount to 6,500 copies, allowing for 1,500 copies extra. What sized document does the gentleman think it would make?

Mr. BORLAND. I think it would be a moderate sized pamphlet.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Printing as to the advisability of having this printed as a document?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think it should be submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Printing before asking unanimous consent to have it printed?

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman that this request that I am making really comes from the gentleman's side of the House, and I am doing it in the absence of the Member who intended to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think that that consideration will be sufficient to waive or set aside the advisability of submitting it to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], chairman of the Committee on Printing, who has been in the Chamber this afternoon?

Mr. BORLAND. I think it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the House to spend $500 to print an important document.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it is not the practice of the House to have these things printed without having the visé of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it is not the practice. There has been some suggestion that some such practice be adopted, but it has not been adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the matter ought to be brought first to the attention of the Committee on Printing, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Merchants' Association of New York City in reference to the speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] some days since.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing as a part thereof a letter written by the Merchants' Association of New York as to the speech recently made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Massachusetts familiar with the contents of it?

Mr. BENNET. No. I am perfectly willing to show it to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know just what this letter is or what is the nature of it.

Mr. BENNET. I can state it in a moment. The gentleman made a charge that the Merchants' Association of New York City was Mr. Peters's association—that is the gentleman's language in the RECORD—and under railroad control, and that the directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad were members of the association. The Merchants' Association denies that over the signature of the president. And it seems to me that, having been attacked in that way, it is entitled to have its declaration inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is the letter couched in language that is polite or not?

Mr. BENNET. It is. It does not even mention the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, if this letter is admitted, I am going to ask unanimous consent to be permitted to make a reply to it.

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE AMERICAN FLAG—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 12587) to prevent and punish the desecration, mutilation, or improper use within the District of Columbia of the flag of the United States of America was, by some mistake or other, referred to the Judiciary Committee. If there be no objection, it will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DOOLING, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. HAY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of William H. Lupton, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. KEISTER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the cases of William H. Jackson (H. R. 15202, 63d Cong.) and Simeon D. Morrison (H. R. 14263, 63d Cong.), no adverse reports having been made thereon.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House will stand in recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 4, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, March 3, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are not to exceed half a dozen Senators in the Chamber. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Husting	Overman	Smoot
Burleigh	James	Owen	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sutherland
Clapp	Jones	Phelan	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Pittman	Thompson
Colt	Kern	Poindexter	Tillman
Culberson	La Follette	Pomerene	Vardaman
Cummins	Lodge	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Curtis	McCumber	Reed	Walsh
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Warren
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	Myers	Sherman	Williams
Gronna	Nelson	Shields
Harding	Newlands	Simmons
Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] are engaged in the Committee on Indian Affairs on matters pending there, but they will come in if their presence is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] are detained from the Senate on public business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], I wish to present some papers relating to another matter, which I will make part of my remarks.

There has been a widely circulated statement that Great Britain, during the Russo-Japanese War, issued a warning to her citizens not to take passage on belligerent merchantmen. The Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress examined this very thoroughly. They found that the only origin of the report was in a letter signed by one C. L. Schlens, in the New York Sun, in which he stated that such a warning had been issued by the British Government. They endeavored to find Mr. Schlens, but his name did not appear in the New York Directory and nothing could be learned.

His letter to the Sun was reprinted in the Gaelic-American and also in the Fatherland, but the Fatherland admitted they had been entirely unable to confirm the statement either by the State Department or from official foreign sources. It was repeated in the Outlook in an article by Prof. Stowell February 23. The Legislative Reference Division of the Library telegraphed to Prof. Stowell and asked him what his documentary authority was. He replied that he had none; that he had simply taken it from the newspapers.

The Reference Division also examined the London Gazette, the British Foreign and State Papers, the British Parliamentary Papers, International Law Treatises, the British Consular Reports, the Hongkong Blue Book, the Hongkong and Shanghai newspapers, and the London Times. The statement was that it was issued by the consul at Shanghai. They could find nothing about it.

I will ask to have the letter with accompanying documents printed with my remarks.

On receiving that I thought I would see if I could find it directly, and I applied to the British Embassy here, and received from them this memorandum:

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington.

Some time last August a statement appeared in the Fatherland and other papers to the effect that His Majesty's Government issued a notification at the beginning of the Russo-Japanese War that no protection would be extended to British subjects who took passage on board vessels of either belligerent.

The embassy inquired of the foreign office whether any such notification had been issued, and received the reply that the above statement was not true. The foreign office added that they never heard that any consular officer issued such a notice, but that, if he did so, it was contrary to instructions sent to all such officers to abstain from giving advice to merchants or other persons.

In short, there never was any such order. I give the document, which I ask to have printed, from the Library of Congress and the statement of the British Embassy.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether in his inquiry his attention was called to a notice purporting to be signed by the British consul general at Shanghai?

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise statement made in the Sun by Mr. Schlens. No such statement ever was made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Did that statement quote the notice itself?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Schlens's note to the Sun, on which the whole thing is based, purports to give an order from the consul general at Shanghai. No such order was ever issued by the British consul general at Shanghai. The whole thing rests on that unauthorized statement of Mr. Schlens, whom nobody could find.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts does not take the position that no country has ever issued such an order?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thought I made it clear that I was dealing with the report that the British Government issued it in the Russo-Japanese War.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand; but I wondered whether the Senator took the position that no country had issued such an order.

Mr. LODGE. I have not investigated any other country, for I have not heard it alleged of any other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is aware that Sweden recently, in the present emergency, issued such an order.

Mr. LODGE. I saw that Sweden had done so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no question about there being ample precedent for it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether there is ample precedent or not. I saw that Sweden had done it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE DIVISION,
Washington.

Referring to a supposed warning by the British Government to its subjects, during the Russo-Japanese War, not to take passage on belligerent merchant ships.

The first mention which we have found relating to this matter is a letter from one C. L. Schlens in the New York Sun of July 30, 1915. The text of a supposed "official order" issued by the British consulate at Shanghai, China, is stated as follows:

"All subjects of the Crown are notified that the British Government will not undertake to be responsible for the safety of any British subject leaving this port on a ship of either of the belligerent nations."

(See "Exhibit A" hereto attached.)

No citation of authority is given for the statement. We have been unable to find the name of C. L. Schlens in the New York City Directory. This letter was reprinted by the Gaelic American in its issue of August 7, 1915, citing the New York Sun of July 30. (See "Exhibit B" hereto attached.)

In a book entitled "Documents on the War of the Nations," Volume II, page 62, by C. L. Droste (Richmond, 1915), the text of this "order" was reprinted upon the authority of the Gaelic American above cited. (See "Exhibit C" hereto attached.)

In the issue of The Fatherland for February 16, 1916, under title of "That warning," the text of the warning, as it appeared in the above publications, is repeated with the statement that The Fatherland had hitherto published the statement, but that neither The Fatherland nor the State Department had been able to confirm it from official British sources. (See "Exhibit D" hereto attached.)

In the Outlook for February 23, 1916, appeared an article by Mr. Ellery G. Stowell, assistant professor of international law and diplomacy at Columbia University, entitled "Armed merchantmen, what shall we do about them?" In this article, on page 422, he seemed to assume that Great Britain had issued such a warning above referred to and discussed the question on that basis. (See "Exhibit E" hereto attached.)

On February 24, 1916, we telegraphed Prof. Stowell asking if he could give us documentary authority for any such warning by Great Britain. (See "Exhibit F.")

On February 25, 1916, we received a reply from Prof. Stowell stating, in effect, that he had no documentary source for his statement, but assumed the truth of the assertion for the sake of discussion. (See "Exhibit G.")

We have been unable to verify this supposed warning, or any similar proclamation or order, from documentary sources. Among the sources we have searched are the following: The London Gazette, British Foreign and State Papers, British Parliamentary Papers, International Law Treatises, the British Consular Reports, the Hongkong Blue Book, the Hongkong and Shanghai newspapers, and the London Times.

[From the New York Sun, July 30, 1915, p. 6.]

A PRECEDENT—GREAT BRITAIN'S WARNING, AS A NEUTRAL, TO HER SUBJECTS.

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: The methods employed by Germany in her submarine warfare have resulted in an admittedly grave situation. Senator STONE, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, a man who by virtue of his position should, if anybody, be qualified to pass judgment upon the questions involved, has unreservedly approved of Germany's act. Vice President MARSHALL likewise has expressed the opinion that Germany in sinking the Lusitania was within her rights. Other high officials of the administration, on the other hand, have strongly condemned Germany. Be this as it may.

I firmly believe that, leaving out of consideration the jingoes on both sides, neither the United States nor Germany desires war, and I am quite sure that not only war, but even the severance of diplomatic relations, would be avoided if only the United States Government would follow a precedent in history.

At the outbreak of the Japanese-Russian War the following official order to all British subjects was issued by the British consulate at Shanghai, China:

"All subjects of the Crown are notified that the British Government will not undertake to be responsible for the safety of any British subject leaving this port on a ship of either of the belligerent nations."

Great Britain's position at that time was, of course, identical with that of the United States at present, and I therefore can not understand why this Government should not adopt the same attitude, thereby overcoming all the present difficulties. Why create a crisis, the consequence of which nobody can foresee, where such a simple remedy is available?

AN ENGLISH PRECEDENT FOR WILSON.

In the New York Sun of July 30 the following letter appeared:

"SIR: The methods employed by Germany in her submarine warfare have resulted in an admittedly grave situation. "NEW YORK, July 29."

The publication of this letter is very timely and is a complete answer to Mr. Wilson's friends who claim there is no precedent for his doing what is his obvious duty in the interests of that humanity whose name he so frequently invokes. It proves that there is a precedent, and an English one at that. England issued this notice when her ally, Japan, was at war with Russia, which for many years had been her enemy. Does Mr. Wilson regard the tie between the United States and England as closer than that which then bound England and Japan? The conclusion that he does will be irresistible if he persists in encouraging American citizens to travel on English munition ships.

[Documents on the War of the Nations. The Lusitania case. Collected and published by C. L. Droste. Vol. II, p. 62.]

A PRECEDENT.

At the outbreak of the Japanese-Russian War the following official order to all British subjects was issued by the British consulate at Shanghai, China:

"All subjects of the Crown are notified that the British Government will not undertake to be responsible for the safety of any British subject leaving this port on a ship of either of the belligerent nations."

EXHIBIT D.

[From the Fatherland, Feb. 16, 1916, Vol. IV, p. 26.]

THAT WARNING.

The Fatherland reprinted some time ago the warning issued by the English consulate in Shanghai, worded as follows:

"All subjects of the Crown are notified that the British Government will not undertake to be responsible for the safety of any British subject leaving this port on a ship of either of the belligerent nations."

The authenticity of this warning has been confirmed by persons who have formerly lived in the Far East, but the efforts of The Fatherland to obtain a confirmation in Shanghai have not so far been crowned with success. The State Department has been equally unsuccessful. In order to prove the truth of the statement it would be necessary to obtain access to the files of the British consulate. This can not be obtained. Even if granted, it would probably be found that the papers in question have disappeared as mysteriously as Sir Edward Grey's secret treaty with France. Meanwhile the State Department has not denied the assertion, but has merely stated its inability to find the fact. We shall be greatly indebted to any of our readers, especially in the Far East, for enlightenment on the subject.

EXHIBIT E.

[From The Outlook, Feb. 23, 1916. "Armed merchantmen: what shall we do about them?" by Ellery C. Stowell, p. 422.]

If Great Britain during the Russo-Japanese War warned her subjects not to travel on belligerent vessels, why should it not be honorable for the American Government to issue a similar warning to American citizens?

Great Britain had in the seas where naval operations were conducted the finest fleet of merchant vessels of any nation, and the warning which she issued to her citizens put them to no inconvenience, but was perhaps a disguised way of increasing the patronage of British liners. Great Britain's action was mostly political. She never would have recognized that she must issue such a warning, and the effect upon either belligerent was of trifling importance. It has no bearing on the submarine issue. British subjects traveling in Russian or Japanese vessels were likely to be captured and otherwise inconvenienced. Her warning brought to their attention the inevitable consequences of a state of war, and did not in any way diminish the protection which she intended to accord them.

NEW YORK, February 25, 1916.

A. P. C. GRIFFIN,
Chief Assistant Librarian, Library of Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

Am investigating source of statement made in the press. My purpose was to discuss the principles, assuming, for the sake of discussion, the truth of the assertion as made and currently believed. The "If" of the question was intended to convey this. I confess my remarks seem to accept the assumption as fact. I had no such intention.

ELLERY C. STOWELL.

BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington.

Some time last August a statement appeared in the Fatherland and other papers to the effect that His Majesty's Government issued a notification at the beginning of the Russo-Japanese War that no protection would be extended to British subjects who took passage on board vessels of either belligerent.

The embassy inquired of the foreign office whether any such notification had been issued, and received the reply that the above statement was not true. The foreign office added that they never heard that any consular officer issued such a notice, but that, if he did so, it was contrary to instructions sent to all such officers to abstain from giving advice to merchants or other persons.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when I introduced yesterday morning Senate concurrent resolution No. 15 I had hopes that we would have an adjournment so that we could take up morning business that I might pertinently direct my remarks to that particular concurrent resolution. It seems to be the desire on the part of the Senate to recess from day to day for the purpose of facilitating the progress of the dam bill, which is now the unfinished business. That bill is not making any great headway and there is no indication that a final disposition of it will be reached in a fortnight.

In a letter from the President of the United States to Mr. POU he suggested that the two branches of Congress should immediately give expression to its views on a most important subject that the President might be guided in his controversy with belligerent powers by the sentiment of the Congress. This is one paragraph from the letter of the President. He said:

I therefore feel justified in asking that your committee will permit me to urge an early vote upon the resolutions with regard to travel on armed merchantmen which have recently been so much talked about in order that there may be afforded an immediate opportunity for full public discussion and action upon them, and that all doubts and conjectures may be swept away—

And so forth.

Mr. President, we all concede that the action taken by the Senate yesterday in no possible way met the views of the President of the United States. If I could give any credence whatever to the expressions made by the Senators who spoke one way after they had voted another, in the tabling of a resolution, I think I can assume that the majority at least of the Senate are in favor of notifying Americans to refrain from exercising the right to travel upon armed merchantmen.

The President desires a speedy determination of this question. The resolution which I have offered directly meets the proposition made by the President. Sooner or later we will have a vote on that resolution, and whether it is voted upon under a motion to table it, or whether it is voted upon on its merits, it nevertheless will carry to the President an expression of the views of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, the settlement of differences which may arise between this country and any other nation primarily falls within the domain of executive diplomacy. The correspondence must be initiated and carried on by the State Department; and in such department these differences should remain until the President has either arrived at a settlement satisfactory to Congress and the country or has informed Congress of his inability to secure such adjustment. And so I feel it would have been not only proper but far better had no resolution directly affecting the point in controversy been introduced while the President was attempting to secure an agreement. There could be no danger in following this ancient rule of procedure, because, after all, Congress is supreme, and if it believes that any settlement secured by the President is not for the best interest of the country, or that it either demands or concedes too much, Congress has the power to so declare; and, Mr. President, it is its duty, representing the people of the country, to declare its conviction.

Had we followed this course and had a satisfactory settlement been secured through diplomatic channels, we should have avoided an unnecessary conflict of authority between the legislative and executive branches of Government. Had the attempted settlement failed, or one been secured which Congress could not indorse, Congress would then have been clearly within the rules of propriety and constitutionality in assuming jurisdiction over the subject matter and taking prompt action thereon.

But this is now past history. A resolution has been offered which, if it had passed, clearly would have overridden one of the contentions of the President. The President now asks us to record our verdict on the point raised. The tabling of the Gore resolution did not meet the President's proposal. Applying the ordinary rule of construction, that a motion to lie on the table means hostility to the views expressed in a tabled resolution, the action of the Senate would be taken to mean that the overwhelming sense of the Senate is that the sinking by a German submarine without notice or warning of an armed merchant vessel resulting in the death of an American citizen would not constitute a just and sufficient cause for war. If this vote means anything, it means that the Senate disagrees absolutely with the President's views and that therefore the President is not sustained. But I will be charitable and assume that it was intended to mean a desire of the Senate to push the whole subject aside. If that be true, then the request of the President "that all doubts and conjectures may be swept away" has not been met.

The President wanted to know whether the Congress did or did not back him. Will a single Senator on the floor assume the responsibility of telling the President or anyone else what the view of the Senate is on the subject of warning American citizens to keep off armed belligerent merchantmen? Can anyone say what the sentiment of the Senate on that subject is?

Mr. President, I do not agree with the President of the United States that it would be improper to suggest to the American traveling public that they refrain from doing that which by every principle of patriotic duty they ought to refrain from doing without any suggestion from any source. I am not in accord with his views as to the full extent of our right to control the methods which may be adopted by belligerents to prosecute their warfare to a successful issue; and I further believe that Congress, representing the sentiment of the country, can very properly give expression to its views, although, as I have suggested, I feel that just at this crucial and critical period of our diplomatic controversy we might well have deferred our action until the executive department had announced either an agreement or a disagreement.

Mr. President, no person who has given this subject any consideration whatever can fail to see the far-reaching consequence of our action, whatever it may be. Whatever conclusion we may arrive at with reference to this submarine controversy, we will be immediately beset with many others of equal concern and gravity.

No one questions what the rule of international law heretofore has been. That rule is that a merchant vessel, armed with a stern gun for defense only, has the same rights and the same status as an unarmed merchant vessel. One of these rights is that it is not to be sunk or its passengers or crew destroyed or their lives endangered by an enemy war vessel unless it attempts to escape after warning. That rule would forbid such vessel being torpedoed or sunk without notice by a submarine. That rule, founded on justice and humanity, met the conditions of warfare at the time it became an international rule. Against a powerful war vessel, with its heavy armor and immense guns, this mere defensive rear gun would be as harmless as a toy. It could not sink a war vessel. Such war vessel could well afford to give notice of its presence and demand a surrender without endangering itself.

It is equally true that writers of international law agree that as all nations are supposed to conform to international law and practice obtaining before war and to make their preparation for war in the light of such rules and in the expectation that they will be followed should war ensue, and therefore the insistence by a neutral power that such rule be modified during the progress of the war would be an unneutral act.

But, Mr. President, the science of war may develop so rapidly during a great world struggle like that now prevailing and such exigencies involving the very life of a belligerent nation may arise as would not only justify but necessitate that nation to decline to follow a rule adopted under conditions which no longer prevail or which are so materially modified by new instrumentalities of warfare as to require a change.

While a neutral may do nothing to weaken or modify the rule, there may be justification for the belligerent in defending its very existence to do so.

And, Mr. President, the same exigency that would justify a warring nation, in the throes of a desperate encounter, to deviate from old rules of international law ought to appeal to every neutral nation to lessen the rigor of its demands for conformity, by a belligerent, in every detail to previous international law.

And, Mr. President, when like disputes arise between this Nation and the entente powers, I shall ask for the same charitable consideration.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. COLT. If the Senator admits that a belligerent may change the rules of international law by reason of changed conditions in modern warfare, or by reason of national necessity or by reason of geographical position, does he not, in fact, then undermine the whole system of international law, with the result that we have no guide to go by?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; international law is based upon those conditions and the reasons growing out of conditions which justify its existence. While heretofore the science of war has progressed so slowly that we have been able to modify the rules of international law without any great disturbance of conditions between the belligerents and neutrals, the rapidity with which changes have been brought about during this last war and the exigencies of the several Governments, due to the new instrumentalities of war, may justify them, not us, in modifying rules, and all of them are modifying the rules; but there is one rule that predominates all international law, and that is the rule of national self-preservation. We must concede that right of self-preservation to every belligerent, even though in the exercise of that right it may interfere with our commerce or may require that our citizens refrain from traveling upon ships that are liable to be sunk.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield again, Mr. President.

Mr. COLT. Does the Senator believe that a neutral nation is obliged to obey the rules of international law which are in force at the outbreak of a war, and that a belligerent is not obliged to obey such rules, but that a belligerent may plead national necessity or changed conditions or some overriding cause as an excuse for modifying such rules of international law?

The Senator from North Dakota is a logician, and I will ask him that, if we once admit the principle that changed conditions may change international rules, whether we then have any rule to go by? Is not that Great Britain's excuse now for the violation of the rules of international law with regard to neutral trade, such as blockade, contraband, and continuous voyage? If we once admit the principle that a belligerent may, owing to changed conditions, or for any other cause, modify the fundamental rules of international law, we have no international law which can be enforced.

Mr. McCUMBER. How is international law made or modified? It is made and modified by the action of a nation acquiesced in by other nations. And the justification for the action by the nation modifying it becomes the reason for the acquiescence of the other nations. Now, just one moment, and I will complete my answer to the Senator.

Mr. COLT. Might I ask the Senator a question on that proposition?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. Suppose there are two propositions of international law which, by reason of changed conditions, become antagonistic, which one must be followed? Now, there is one fundamental, unchanging principle of international law, and that is the right of every nation to defend itself and to protect itself against annihilation. Every other principle of international law must yield to that superior right of every nation, and when in the throes of a conflict the national life demands that a rule of international law shall be changed, then the nation so engaged and whose existence is so threatened in that conflict is justified in modifying or abrogating that rule of international law.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. COLT addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator from Rhode Island, as he first addressed me.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I find no warrant for a nation changing the rules of international law during the progress of a war, but after the war is over the rules may then be changed by agreement.

As to the second proposition of the Senator, if he says that the necessity for the preservation of the life of a nation may override the rules of international law, in analogy to municipal law, where we find that the safety of the Republic is the supreme law—if that is his fundamental proposition, then I can only repeat what I have said before, that we have no guide to go by, because every nation at war believes that the life of the country is at stake; and therefore if we admit that the safety of the nation is a justifiable excuse for evading the rules of international law we undermine the whole system and have no guide or compass to direct us.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator believe that if the salvation of this country depended upon our refusing to follow an old international code, the duty of the country would be to throw the old international code to the winds?

Mr. COLT. I believe we would do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not self-preservation the first rule?

Mr. COLT. I believe, Mr. Presidest, that we would act just as the belligerents are acting, because we would be in an atmosphere of force; we would be in an atmosphere where we believed the life of the Nation was at stake; we would be breathing the air of sacrifice and death; and therefore we would violate the rules of international law if we believed that it was necessary for our self-preservation. Conceding this, it does not alter in any way the position of a great neutral power, which must insist that the belligerents shall obey the rules of international law. This theory of self-preservation shows that international law is in a way defective, because international law undertakes to apply rules established by nations in time of peace to a nation when it is at war and governed primarily by the principle of self-preservation; in other words, international law, when confronted by these conditions, seeks to realize an impossible undertaking. But this defect in international law does not alter the only position that a neutral nation should occupy, and that is that the rules of international law in force at the outbreak of the war must be upheld during the continuance of the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the logic of the Senator is that while this country would ignore, and would be justified in ignoring, international law if the life of the Nation were at stake, we should, as a great neutral power, insist that others should not exercise such a right. I confess I can not agree either to the logic or to the justice of that situation. We have at all times proclaimed the right of nations to exist, to protect themselves, to do those things that are necessary for their life protection; and yet the Senator would say that while we have a right so to do in our own self-defense, our duty is to enforce the old law upon nations struggling for their very existence, even though the result of the enforcement would be the annihilation of such belligerent countries. I confess I can not agree with that philosophy.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I shall not interrupt the Senator further, with the exception of one question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not at all disturbed.

Mr. COLT. Germany says that it invaded Belgium on the ground of self-preservation; that that was the reason that justified it in violating the neutrality of Belgium, which it had agreed by treaty to hold to be a neutralized country. Every act of either belligerent in violation of the existing rules of international law is put broadly upon the ground of self-preservation. Does the Senator think that the invasion of Belgium by Germany was justified upon the ground that it was necessary for the self-preservation of the German Empire, attacked as it was by the most powerful nations in Europe?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as an American citizen I am neutral. Therefore I shall express no opinion as to the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of the action of Germany. I hardly think that it is proper for a Member of the American Senate to express any view pro or con, though he may have them, upon that particular subject. His duty is to maintain the neutrality of his country without reference to which countries are in the right or which are in the wrong. An expression from him, a representative of his Nation, would be tainted with partiality, and partiality is unneutral. Hence, I shall have to decline to answer that question. I believe in being so everlastingly neutral in this war that not one of the nations engaged in the conflict can make any complaint against us; and recognizing the ferocity of the war, recognizing how desperate is the situation of each and every country involved in the war, I shall exercise the sentiment of charitableness, even though one or the other belligerent may in its struggle crowd a little beyond the rule of international law heretofore obtaining. We have done so when we were engaged in war, and other nations undoubtedly will do the same. But in the discussion of this particular resolution it is not necessary to go into that question. It is simply aimed at the duty of the American people, the duty which they owe to the United States to refrain from embarrassing this country in its negotiations or from plunging this country into a conflict by insisting upon the exercise of every legal right.

When Sweden requested her citizens not to travel upon armed belligerent merchantmen she did not consider that she had recognized the German contention or the Italian contention or the British contention. Her sole position was that she wanted to keep out of war, and she did not wish to have her citizens jeopardize the interests of the country.

Mr. President, I confess I have great difficulty in bringing my mind and reason to concur in the proposition that while an armed merchantman may, without warning, use its weapon to sink and destroy a submarine, the submarine may not, without warning, use its only weapon, the torpedo, to destroy the armed merchantman. I am not unmindful of the argument advanced to meet this, that the one is a war vessel whose only function is destruction, and the other a peaceful vessel whose real function is noncombatant, except in a very limited defense equipment. But so long as passenger ships are regarded in international law as lawful prizes, and so long as the submarine would endanger its own existence by exposing itself to the sting end of this peaceful ship, I submit that there is fair ground for some new rule as to the rights of a merchant vessel to carry guns if she wishes to be immune from assault without warning, and, I might add, as to the right of neutrals to insist upon protection if they travel on such armed merchant vessels.

Mr. President, our contention and insistence upon any rule of conduct to be followed by any belligerent ought to be founded upon justice, not alone to ourselves, but to the nation against which it is urged. Our contention should be unquestionably right, absolutely fair, and everlastingly consistent.

I confess I can not see anything fair in the proposition that while a submarine—which may easily be sunk by a single shot from one of these defense guns—must give notice before it fires at the armed merchant vessel, the armed merchant vessel need not give notice that it purposes to fire at the submarine. If I know that you are armed for the very purpose of shooting me if you see me coming toward you, I can not convince myself that a code of action which says that you can shoot me at sight but that I must give you timely notice to surrender is entirely free from question.

What would we do under the same circumstances? We now propose to build a large number of submarines. These new war vessels are to be constructed that they can be used both as coast defenses and as commerce raiders. Suppose we were at war with some great, powerful nation. Suppose there were some basis in what I regard as mere hysteria, the cry of danger of invasion. We find a belligerent vessel, with a defensive gun, carrying munitions to our foes. We are maneuvering for position to give it notice. In its attempt to escape it is endeavoring to get us within range of its defensive gun. What would the captain of that submarine do? If he should take that chance and the defensive gun should send his submarine and its crew down to death, what would our verdict be? Would we say "That is all right"? No, Mr. President; the order would be given by our admiralty to all submarine commanders, "Your first duty is to protect yourselves." What we would command in our war we ought at least to consider a questionable privilege in the war now pending.

The question, at least, Mr. President, is of such a nature and of such delicacy that it seems to me that it is the moral duty of every patriotic American to relieve his country from embarrassment by refraining to travel on such armed vessels. He has no right, by his recklessness or audacity, to endanger the good relations of this country with any nation now at war.

If these propositions be true—and I can not see how they can be denied—if it is the duty of the true American, irrespective of legal right, to refrain from travel on such armed vessels, then it logically follows that Congress or the President may with entire propriety call his attention to that duty, and even enforce such duty by prohibiting armed vessels to leave our ports with passengers.

We have already exercised the power of refusing passports. I do not concede that such action would be an admission of the claim of any belligerent to any new right, though I admit it might embarrass the negotiation now going on between this Nation and Germany. But the President has requested this action, and we should meet it just as though it were an original question. It has not been met at the present time. No one knows but that if the President should insist upon one phase of this controversy as being the rule which should guide the American people, Congress might immediately thereafter refuse to stand by the President; and it is for the best interests of the country that it should know now just what the view of Congress on this subject is and that there shall be no contention between the executive branch and the legislative branch of the Government. When it comes to the final test of power it lies in Congress, and Congress ought to be courageous enough, it ought to be brave enough, to meet the issue fairly and squarely and say to the President whether we believe that we ought to say to the American people, "Keep off of these armed vessels during the continuance of this war or until their status is definitely settled by the great countries of the world."

Mr. President, I am not at all fearful of any war between this country and any of the belligerents. They can not get at us. They can not loosen their grip on each other. Each one is bending its every effort to save itself. Each one thinks that its life depends upon taking the life of the other. The other nations will not make war on us; and I do not believe, under any condition that has so far arisen, that we will make an aggressive war against them. Congress at all times must represent the consensus of public sentiment, and that sentiment does not point toward war.

Mr. President, I am not proposing that we, a neutral, should attempt to declare any new international law. On the contrary, I admit that an enforced change by us would be an unneutral act. What I maintain is that we ought not to blind our eyes to changed conditions of warfare, due to the use of new instrumentalities of destruction, involving such mighty consequences to a belligerent that it might justly and fairly question the old rule; and that, there being reasonable grounds for contention, we ought not to allow any of our citizens to precipitate us into armed conflict; that if it is the patriotic duty of an American citizen to refrain from exercising even an undoubted right to travel abroad to avoid a basis of war, then it is clearly within the province of the country—yes, further, it is the duty of the country—to enforce that moral duty upon him. As between a naked legal right that affects one individual only and a moral obligation that may affect very seriously 100,000,000 people, the moral obligation should prevail over the legal right. Our people ought to refrain from traveling on armed merchantmen. Congress ought to so inform them of their moral duty; and when we have informed them, it is my conviction that there is sufficient patriotism in the country that not a single passenger will attempt to go abroad upon one of those armed merchantmen.

I ask that the resolution which I have presented may be printed after the argument I have made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to (S. Con. Res. 15) is as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, acting in his diplomatic capacity, has so far been unable to secure an understanding with the central belligerent powers of Europe with reference to the attack by submarines without notice on merchant ships of a belligerent nation armed for defense only; and

Whereas the President has maintained through all the negotiations that under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining the firing upon such merchant vessel by any warship without previous notice is illegal, and has notified the said central powers that American citizens have a clear right under international law to travel on such merchant vessels, and has further notified said central Governments that should the lives of American citizens be lost through such illegal acts the said powers would be held to strict accountability; and

Whereas the said central powers have declared that such armed merchant vessels would be considered and treated as ships of war and subject to attack as such without notice, and have further declared their purpose to so attack such merchant ships; and

Whereas it is conceded that the submarine, as an instrument of warfare, was unknown when such international rule was established; and

Whereas it is well known that such submarine by giving notice to an armed ship might endanger its own existence; and

Whereas in one instance at least, during the present war in Europe, a submarine has been sunk and its crew destroyed by such armed merchant ship; and

Whereas many new and novel means of warfare have been employed by all of the nations engaged in that struggle, raising new questions of rights and responsibilities, both as to neutrals and belligerents, and upon which opinions and views may justly differ; and

Whereas the President has requested that each branch of Congress shall express its conviction as to the propriety of warning the citizens of the United States to refrain from travel on such armed ships: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that, under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining, such merchant vessel, though armed with a stern gun of comparatively small caliber, and for defense only, has the status and rights in war of an unarmed merchant ship, but that the science of war has developed with such extraordinary rapidity during the present conflict, and new weapons of warfare, including the submarine and aero fighting craft, have been employed with such far-reaching consequences and which may threaten the very life of any one of the nations involved, and which may necessitate a revision of the codes of international law pertaining to the rights and duties of neutrals and belligerents in the light of such new instrumentalities; that, while the strict legal right of an American citizen under international law to travel and ship his goods on an armed merchant vessel may be an established right, it is none the less the moral and patriotic duty of every American citizen, in view of the desperate character of the warfare now raging in Europe and the desperate situation of each and all of the warring powers, to refrain from needlessly exposing himself to danger and, by his recklessness or audacity, involving his country, or threatening to involve it, in a conflict that may seriously affect the welfare of a hundred million of his fellow citizens; and that therefore the citizens of the United States should be, and they are hereby, requested to refrain from travel on such armed merchant ships until an agreement has been reached between this country and other warring nations to the end that the endeavors of the President may not be jeopardized or halted or this Government forced into hostility with another country because of the unnecessary or reckless attitude of any citizen of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that a misapprehension prevails in some sections as to the scope of the original Gore resolution—that it is an attempt to prohibit American citizens from going abroad on armed merchantmen and that it is in some way an abatement or an abandonment of a right. I desire to call attention through the RECORD of those who are interested in the matter to the fact that the original Gore resolution was in harmony with the action which the Government took under two administrations in regard to Mexico, and took the third time under the present administration in its note of October 14, 1915, that it is no abandonment of a right, no surrender of an honor; that it was simply a suggestion that there are times in the history of a nation, as in the history of an individual, when it may be wise to forego the insistence upon a mere technical right rather than hazard the consequences of the insistence upon that right, and to encourage foregoing the insistence by withholding passports to persons going upon armed merchantmen.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has suggested that after this discussion there ought to be enough patriotism in the American people to refrain from taking a step which may entail unmeasured trouble and loss of life upon the American people. But as showing that there are still those in our midst who have no regard for the consequences of their acts to themselves or upon the millions of this country who dread and abhor war and pray for the averting of war, I desire to submit an article which I find in the Herald this morning, entitled "Americans sail on armed liner." I ask that the Secretary read the article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMERICANS SAIL ON ARMED LINER—WHITE STAR STEAMER "CANOPIC" TO MOUNT GUNS AT GIBRALTAR.

NEW YORK, March 3.

Before the White Star Line Canopic sailed to-day for the Azores, Gibraltar, and Naples, Capt. R. W. James notified the passengers that the vessel will be armed on her arrival at Gibraltar with guns to be used in case the Canopic is attacked by submarines in the Mediterranean.

There were 350 persons, including passengers and crew, on board. Among them were three American citizens.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bellows, of Brooklyn, said the arming of the liner would not deter them. They have made three trips through the war zone. The third American citizen who sailed was W. W. Nicholls, of Chicago.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is not my province or right to pass upon the moral action of others or the action of others which involves a moral question. I have put this in the RECORD that if in that voyage after that ship leaves Gibraltar, armed as the officers notified these people it would be, it will be for the American people to determine what course they should take, what they shall bear as the consequence of the reckless bravado of these people, who, with this notice, take their chances upon that ship after she leaves Gibraltar and sails into the Mediterranean—that when that time comes there can be no question here or elsewhere but what these people, in a spirit of reckless bravado, dared the danger of the war zone, and that in dealing with what our responsibility is for the injury of those people we may have in mind that they took this fate upon themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish the Senator would have a further paragraph in the article read if it be the same one which I read this morning—the paragraph which states the pleasure the passengers felt in the thrill of danger.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was in the Post.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, that it is an article in another morning paper. I was quite impressed with the reason which the passengers gave for incurring the hazard of the voyage.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; the article I had read is from the Herald, and has been read in full. The article the Senator from New Hampshire refers to must be from some other paper.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is an article in the Washington Post this morning referring to the same matter the Senator from Minnesota called attention to. I find, in addition to what the Senator had read, the article says—I will read this account:

Capt. James said that in the event of his encountering an enemy submarine he would make every effort to elude it. The use of the guns would depend on circumstances.

Two of the Americans were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bellows, of 30 Pierrepont Street, Brooklyn. Mr. Bellows is an importer, and with his wife has made the trip through the danger zone three times. When asked if he did not fear to sail in view of the captain's announcement, he said:

"By no means. I have run blockades before this, and so has my wife, and I really enjoy the thrills that come with it."

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss international law and the finespun theories with reference to the rights of American citizens under it. Here is a concrete example of the disposition of those who now under the present condition of things want to travel upon armed belligerent ships.

The American people may not comprehend fully the finespun theories as to their rights under international law based upon the piratical conditions of a hundred years ago, but they will understand what the disposition is on the part of those who insist upon traveling on these ships, and they will not consider that the Nation's honor is at stake in seeing to it that some individual shall enjoy the "thrill" that comes from traveling upon an armed merchant ship.

In this condition of things, and in considering the right of individuals who simply seek the enjoyment of such "thrills," it seems to me that we ought to place over against their desire the happiness, welfare, and peace of a hundred millions of people who are willing to stay at home and who are willing to deny themselves the exercise of rights that they may have in order that the country may continue to remain at peace.

Is it possible that if this boat should be sunk and this man lose his life it would be held that we are justified, in maintaining the national honor in the assertion of his right to enjoy a "thrill," to embroil the whole American people in this conflict?

Mr. President, we may find that under international law this man had a right to do what he is doing, but the American people will never stand behind such a proposition as that and try to enforce it at the expense of their peace and their welfare. They will never fight for a thrill.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the reorganization of the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 4840) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in connection with the bill I desire to make a very brief statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator is this a report from the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; this is a committee bill. In connection with it I desire to submit a very brief statement.

In presenting the matter I desire to say that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has been considering this measure for the past two months, and I believe I can safely say to the Senate that it is the most comprehensive measure that was ever presented to Congress for the reorganization of the Army.

The essential features comprise a sufficient increase of the Regular Army to enable the mobile force to be organized in divisions and brigades, and to provide a sufficient corps of Coast Artillery to man existing and approved new batteries. The new mobile army will comprise 64 regiments of Infantry organized into 7 divisions, 25 regiments of Cavalry organized into 2 divisions and the remaining regiments attached to Infantry divisions, 21 regiments of Field Artillery, and 7 regiments of Engineers. This will give proper garrisons to Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippines, and provide 4 Infantry and 2 Cavalry divisions within the United States, where it is intended to train large numbers of men during short enlistments for the reserves, the new enlistment contracts to provide for that feature.

The personnel of staff departments and corps are increased to provide a balanced organization of the divisions and brigades and to furnish the officers and men required for the supply and manufacturing depots and important administrative duties.

In addition to the reorganization of the Regular Army, provision is made for the organization of volunteer forces in each congressional district. More liberal appropriations for the National Guard and other features intended to build up that force are included. The volunteer force authorized will be a strictly Federal force and will not be under the control of governors in any way.

Provision is made for an officers' reserve corps and for a reserve officers' training corps intended to embrace students at colleges and other institutions of learning where military instruction is a part of the curriculum.

A short enlistment is provided to induce men of the Regular Army to enter the reserve, and a payment of $24 per annum will be made so as to insure their connection with the War Department authorities. To those enlisted men of the Regular Army who remain six years with the colors, among whom are found those best qualified for the positions of noncommissioned officers, an opportunity to enter the civil service under the War Department is provided. For the younger enlisted men there will be provided an opportunity to enter the United States Military Academy as cadets. Enlisted men between 18 and 22 years of age may be appointed at the rate of one to each regiment, and the Corps of Cadets is increased to provide for this.

The expansive principle of organization of the Army is continued, but the minimum strength of organizations is not so low as at present, no organization being required to absorb more than one-third of its war strength of reservists or recruits in event of war. This gives a peace strength for the Regular Army of about 178,000 men and a war strength of about 250,000, which, with the Federal volunteers and National Guard, should eventually provide a much better state of defense than at present. Summer camps of instruction will be provided for those who do not find it convenient to attach themselves to any of the forces authorized permanently.

I may say in conclusion that I will go into the details of the bill later on. As a basis for it I prepared a bill during the summer and fall and submitted it to the Committee on Military Affairs, and taking that as a basis the committee has worked out this bill. So it is really not an individual bill but a bill formulated and prepared by the committee, and it is the first one that has been introduced in the Senate on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. SHIELDS. May I ask if the yeas and nays have been ordered on the pending amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from Iowa requested the yeas and nays, but they have not been ordered as yet according to the record.

Mr. SHIELDS. I renew the request.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the yeas and nays are ordered, I may say that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] asked me if I would be willing to withdraw the amendment to enable him to offer one to the body of section 6. I indicated that I would be willing to do it. But I do not see him here and, of course, I can not make the request for him. I want to be entirely fair about it, however.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH entered the Chamber.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana is now in the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to say a word before the vote is taken upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

On February 28 an amendment offered by myself was passed over by request of the Senator from Tennessee. That amendment substitutes costs for value as provided in the bill in determining the amount that is to be paid at the end of the 50-year period, should the Government take over the property. It presents squarely these two conflicting views. If the amendment offered by me should be adopted much of the force of the argument made by the Senator from Iowa in support of his amendment would be weakened at least, and moreover if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted there would be less justification for the amendment offered by myself.

I am under the impression that logically the Senate should take a vote on my amendment first, and if it is rejected and the principle of value at the end of 50 years remains in the bill, then it would seem to me quite appropriate that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa should be addressed to the bill as it then stands. I submit, accordingly, to the Senator from Iowa whether it is not his view that it would be more logical and appropriate that action be had on my amendment first.

Mr. CUMMINS. I repeat publicly what I said to the Senator from Montana last night, that I recognize the force of the suggestion made by him, and I am willing to withdraw the amendment now pending, with the notice that, after the disposition of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and which has been passed over, I shall again offer it. I withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are we to set aside the order for the yeas and nays and withdraw the amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not consent to setting aside the order for the yeas and nays or the withdrawal of the amendment, because I can not see why we should not go on with it and dispose of it. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa has been debated for two days, and I think it ought to be acted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. The yeas and nays have been ordered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They were ordered. They were ordered this morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. After the yeas and nays have been ordered, can an amendment be withdrawn without unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a moot question between the Chair and the Senate. The Chair has always felt that it is the constitutional privilege of a Member of the Senate, when seconded by one-fifth of the Members, to have a vote upon the question presented for any purpose he may want to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is anything in order after the yeas and nays are ordered except to call the roll?

Mr. WALSH. I do not feel that the question of order is important enough to justify any delay about the matter. If there is any objection to that procedure, I shall not urge it. I did not imagine that the Senator from Tennessee would have any objection.

Mr. SHIELDS. I objected because we have thoroughly debated the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and I thought it ought to be disposed of. I understand the Senator's request is not made upon a personal ground, but because he thinks the pending amendment would come in better later on. Of course, if the Senator makes the request for some personal reason, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WALSH. No; it is not a personal matter. But I felt that that was the logical order, and I deferred asking a vote on my amendment at the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Regular order, Mr. President!

Mr. SHIELDS. I differ with the Senator as to what is the logical order. I insist upon my objection, and I insist upon the roll call.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was unable to hear the request of the Senator from Tennessee, and I do not know what position he has taken upon the pending matter.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Tennessee insists upon the roll call, which has been ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that; but the intimation of the Chair was that there was doubt about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wants to be perfectly frank about this matter. The Chair has always felt that when the yeas and nays were called for and seconded and the order made, the Senator calling for the yeas and nays, sustained by the second of the Senate, was entitled to have the yeas and nays taken and the vote recorded upon the proposition presented; but the Chair was overruled by the Senate to the extent that the Senate held that the question could be subsequently amended, even after the yeas and nays were ordered, and could be subsequently discussed.

At that time the Chair expressed the opinion that the Chair ought never to order that the calling of the yeas and nays be proceeded with until the Chair was satisfied that all amendments had been submitted and that all argument had been had that any Senator desired to present to a pending amendment; so that when the yeas and nays were taken it would be with the full consent of the Senate. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this question. The difficulty is, however, entirely out of the way now, as the Senator from Iowa is not asking further to withdraw the amendment. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is absent from the city, but before leaving he gave me permission to vote on any matter before the Senate. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I have been informed that if present he would vote as I intend to vote on this amendment. So I vote "nay."

Mr. HARDWICK (when his name was called). I inquire has the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I withhold my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who, I understand, has not voted; but he informed me that he would vote upon this matter as I intend to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being informed, however, that if the Senator from Pennsylvania were present he would vote as I am about to vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer the pair I have announced with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I will not vote.

I wish to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, and in his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who I observe has not voted. For that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. The junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without noticing the absence of my pair, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). I desire to announce that I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Hollis	Kern	Poindexter
Borah	Hughes	La Follette	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Husting	Lane	Sherman
Cummins	James	Lee, Md.	Smith, Mich.
Gore	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martine, N. J.	Walsh

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 18, after the word "That," it is proposed to insert "unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States."

Mr. NELSON. Is there not a mistake as to the place where the amendment should come in?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; it comes in on page 3, line 18, after the word "That."

Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to enable the Government itself, through the Reclamation Service, to retain such power sites as it may need in the development of irrigation projects. The amendment incorporates such a proviso in the bill, and I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not object to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I object to that amendment. As I understand its application, I think it would withdraw from the provisions of the bill all navigable streams where it is possible to have an irrigation project.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My attention was diverted and I did not catch what the Senator said.

Mr. SHIELDS. I say I think the effect of the amendment would be to withdraw from the provisions of the bill the navigable streams of the whole country, so that the bill would not apply to anything.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it could not possibly have that effect. The only effect it could possibly have would be that any particular application would be submitted to the Reclamation Service and they would be required to determine whether the site was needed for a reclamation project. I think it would be really a great mistake if such a proviso were not incorporated in the bill. I have in mind some particular instances of sites which are under consideration for use by the Reclamation Service for developing power to be used in pumping water to irrigate certain tracts of arid land. They ought to be allowed to have those power sites for that purpose. The amendment can not possibly prevent the granting of permits for any site that is not specifically required by the Reclamation Service. They would have to determine that question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that is not the effect of the amendment, as I see it, as applied to this section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have the amendment again stated. I was unable to catch it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, on line 18, after the word "That," it is proposed to insert "unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That, unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States, the Secretary of War may grant a permit or permits for such dam—

And so forth.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not think, if the Senator from Tennessee will give consideration to the matter, that he will object to the United States Government itself, which now controls this matter, having the use of such sites as may be required in carrying out irrigation works in the West under a policy which has been adopted and to which the Government is committed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to say, in answer to the statement of the Senator from Washington, that my objection to the amendment is very largely due to the fact that it will bring two different departments of the Government into this one matter. We have voted that that should not be the case. I have no doubt that if there is a great reclamation project which is paramount in importance to a navigation project, if the Department of the Interior were to request the Secretary of War not to grant a permit for that site, without full investigation at least, that he would not do so. The amendment does not make any provision concerning the character or size of the reclamation project. It may be a very insignificant one, compared to which navigation is decidedly paramount; and yet, under the terms of the amendment, the Secretary of War would be bound and could not in any manner grant a permit for the construction of navigation works.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, Mr. President, the Reclamation Service, of which the Secretary of the Interior is the head, can be depended upon to exercise as wise a discretion in regard to reclamation matters as can the Secretary of War. That is the only difference which the Senator specifies. He prefers that the Secretary of War should determine the importance of the site and its comparative value for navigation and reclamation purposes. Why can you not depend upon the Reclamation Service in that regard as well as upon the Secretary of War? Both would have to act, Mr. President, because the Reclamation Service could not interfere with the navigation of a stream or do anything that would be injurious to the stream in that regard.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, one of the difficulties, as has been suggested to me by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is that there are reclamation projects in various parts of the United States on private lands; and, as a matter of fact, the reclamation act is not limited to public lands. For instance, there is a great dam at The Buttes, in Texas, where there is no public land; but, nevertheless, the Government of the United States is making improvements there. It seems to me the amendment would give a coordinate department the power to veto the action of the Secretary of War, which would be absolutely wrong. It is also wrong to mix these two things together, because the Secretary of War has in mind the interest of navigation; that is the all-important thing with him. The Secretary of the Interior would have in mind, no doubt, the important element of the question of reclamation, and it seems to me that you would often get a deadlock in these enterprises.

Inasmuch as we have already voted not to have the Secretary of the Interior in this matter, just as, no doubt, in the other bill the Secretary of War would not be suggested as having any control or power of limitation upon the Secretary of the Interior in the matter of water-power sites on the public domain, it seems to me this ought to be kept separate. I do not like the idea of mixing the two, making a deadlock, and making a comparison between whether the reclamation project is more important than the navigation project, and leaving it practically in the power of the Department of the Interior to block it entirely because you do not give the Secretary of War the power to determine it, no matter how important the project may be.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I had very much hoped that no debate would be precipitated over this amendment. The ease with which we can fall into error here is disclosed by the assumption of the Senator from Colorado that there is going to be some conflict between irrigation and navigation in this matter. Why should there be any conflict between the use of these power sites for the improvement of a reclamation project and the navigation of the stream, any more than there will be a conflict between the improvement of them by some private grantee and the navigation of the stream? If the Government of the United States, in carrying out some great irrigation project, puts in a dam at a power site, that dam is not going to have any different effect upon navigation than it would have if a private company put in the dam.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not understand that under these reclamation acts there is any authority for power plants to be constructed. The reclamation act is for the reclamation of arid lands, and, consequently, it has nothing to do with the development of public power sites. Consequently, you have two different objects to serve. It is natural that these two officers should differ in their own minds as to the relative importance of the one object or the other.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has a vast fund of knowledge, to which I have listened with a great deal of profit, about these matters connected with our western streams; but in view of that, I am somewhat surprised to hear him say that the Reclamation Service have no power to put in a power plant. They have hundreds of power plants. They have just as much authority to put in a power plant to use for pumping water as they have to get water by gravity.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not under the reclamation act, if they have any such power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is under the reclamation act, and they are constantly exercising the power under the reclamation act.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is the Government of the United States——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, if the Senator pleases. Consider the actual proceeding. If the Reclamation Service should find that some power site was essential to the development of an irrigation project which it had in contemplation it would put in a dam there in order to develop power, which power would be used in pumping water upon the project. Instead of interfering with navigation that would improve navigation. You would accomplish the double purpose of improving navigation and of carrying out the irrigation project, both of which are functions of the Government and both of which are policies to which the Government is committed. It is no new departure. It is simply preserving and protecting, for the benefit of one of the established Government services, the property and franchises which the Government already owns.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Reclamation Service has power to construct a power plant I can not find it in the act. In order to aid and assist in the irrigation of arid lands, in taking water out of the stream and applying it to the lands, it might have the incidental power to construct some works that would aid in that; but the two things are inconsistent. Whenever you take any water out of a stream you are impairing navigation instead of aiding and assisting it. Whenever you take water for the purpose of irrigation of arid lands you are absorbing water, whereas in the other instance the object is to increase the amount of water for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that it is not an unusual thing to take water out of a navigable stream for irrigation purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true.

Mr. WORKS. There may be surplus water not needed for navigation purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; that is true.

Mr. WORKS. That might occur under this bill, if it were passed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Possibly; that is true; but what I object to is another department of the Government having an absolute veto on the power of the Secretary of War to do something with relation to a site which he thinks is more important for this purpose than for any other purpose connected with increasing or improving the navigation of the stream.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but that is another question altogether. The Senator was saying that taking water out of the stream would interfere with navigation. Now, that is not necessarily so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, it would depend. If they needed improvement in navigation, as a general rule, they would need more water. Of course, it might not be, in a particular instance you might name, that it would work that way; but the difficulty lies in giving a veto power upon the Secretary of War, so that, no matter how important he thinks the enterprise may be, he can not authorize it to be carried on, because another department has indicated that it wants the site for a reclamation project.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, all of the provisions that are in the bill relative to the protection of navigation remain in it; and it is not necessary that there should be any provision to protect navigable streams, useful for the purposes of navigation, from an act of the Reclamation Service. Those two different jurisdictions are well defined. We have placed the control over navigation in the War Department, and we have placed the control over reclamation matters in the Interior Department. The Senator is so jealous of the powers of what he has selected as the department to control development under this bill that he wants even to invade the functions of the Reclamation Service, and allow the Secretary of War to control that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that it is only the zeal with which the Senator has propelled himself to accomplish an object which he has in view, in pursuance of a general policy of liberal legislation as to the granting of public resources, that leads the Senator to maintain such a position as that; because there can not be any danger in leaving reclamation matters where they are now, in the control of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There can not be any danger, Mr. President, in leaving this power with the Secretary of War. It should be in one man's hands. The Senate has voted that way by a very decided majority. It seems to me that if the Secretary of War is presented with a situation where it is more important to the interests of the Government that a reclamation project should go there, he unquestionably has the power under this bill to say, "I do not want it for navigation." If you are going to have two heads to determine this matter, instead of one head, you will have a lot of discontent and a lot of squabbles that will produce disorder, and consequently it will not be to the best interest of the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only desire to add one word. We will not have two heads; it will not create any divided authority in administering this bill if the amendment which I propose shall be inserted, because the function of the Reclamation Service referred to there is limited to the particular matter of reclamation. They are the only ones who are qualified to determine reclamation matters and to form a correct judgment as to what is needed in carrying out a reclamation project.

It seems to me to be inconsistent with the entire framework of reclamation legislation to turn the matter over to the Secretary of War. He has studied matters of navigation. They have nothing to do, or only a very indirect connection, with the science of war; but through practice the War Department has familiarized itself with matters of the improvement of rivers for purposes of navigation. They have not, however, undertaken to familiarize themselves with reclamation matters and irrigation matters under the public-land laws of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I call the Senator's attention to the case of United States against Rio Grande Co. in One hundred and forty-third United States, in which the United States obtained a perpetual injunction against the defendant irrigation company, which was diverting water from the Rio Grande River for irrigation purposes, whereby it was destroying the navigation of that river. The Senator's amendment will allow to be done exactly what the court in that case held could not be done under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all, Mr. President—not at all. It would not allow it to be done to any greater extent than it is allowed now. The only difference is that in one case the improvement, if it is needed in the development of an irrigation project, would be made by the Government, and in the other case it would be made by private individuals or companies. The private company, under the grant of the franchise in this bill and under the State laws, can take water out of a stream, in so far as it does not interfere with navigation, to irrigate land. The Government can do the same thing, in so far as it does not interfere with navigation, and it can not go any further than that. Furthermore, Mr. President, there are a great many cases in which no water is taken out of the stream at all in which a plant of this kind may be used for irrigation; and in the particular cases that I have in mind there would not be any water taken out of the stream at all. The power would be developed and used for pumping water from some other source. They may pump the water from underground water supplies in wells. It is expensive; but if the Government owns the plant, and gets its power at cost, as it would be able to do if this amendment is adopted, it can make a success of pumping water from wells and irrigating the land with it. But if the Government grants the franchise to a private company, and then has to buy that power from the private company and pay that company a large profit on its enterprise, it can not afford to do it.

While these franchises are in the hands of the Government, it seems to me that wise business policy on the part of the Government, and ordinary discretion, would induce us to put a proviso in the bill enabling the Government, in cases where it may be necessary, to retain those sites which are required for its own use, so it may have this cheap power which is essential to carry out an irrigation project.

I know of some localities in the State of Washington—one in particular—where a reclamation scheme has been discussed for a great many years depending upon a gravity system, where it was proposed to bring water some 30 or 40 miles from a lake in a mountain, bring it in a siphon under the Columbia River, and up again upon a high plateau upon the opposite side of the river. The engineering difficulties and the great cost have so far prevented any action upon that proposition. Subsequently it was discovered that a much cheaper way can be found to irrigate some 500,000 acres of beautifully lying land in a delightful climate, as rich as any of the lands of the State, but worthless for agricultural purposes unless water can be put upon it. It has been discovered that there is an underground supply of water. Near by are some of the possible power sites, such as are contemplated by this bill, in the Columbia River. When a proposition is made that a franchise for one of those sites shall be granted, the effect of the proviso which I propose is that the question shall be submitted to the Reclamation Service, and of course the question would have to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior whether he desired to use the site for the purpose of developing power to pump water from this underground source of supply to irrigate the land which otherwise is unproductive.

It seems to me that instead of putting obstacles in the way, instead of divesting ourselves of any opportunity to develop these resources, where we would accomplish the double object of improving the navigation of the river and at the same time of carrying out a great reclamation project, that we ought not to hesitate for a moment to do it.

I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said in explanation of the amendment. It seems to me to be perfectly clear. The objections which the Senators have stated, it seems to me, are due perhaps to a misunderstanding of the purpose of the amendment, because it does not interfere in any way whatever with the accomplishment of the objects of the bill. It does not divide the authority under which it is to be administered; it does not interfere with the purposes of navigation; it simply gives a preference to the Government itself. That is all it does. Just as you yourselves in framing this bill in the committee have given a preference to municipal corporations, municipal subdivisions of States, and public-utility companies, so here we add to that list a public service of the United States. It is in harmony with the principles which you have recognized in framing the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS and Mr. JONES addressed the Chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. JONES. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada, if he desires to interrupt me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I also had the impression that the Senator was through.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am about to conclude.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator a question, however, as I have only just come into the Chamber, and my attention has been arrested by his remarks, which relate to a very important point.

I have the Senator's amendment before me, but I do not quite understand it. The amendment that I have is as follows:

Unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States.

I do not quite understand what that relates to, because I have not the context.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course the Senator would not understand it unless he noted the place where it is to be inserted. Has the Senator the bill there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 3 of the bill, line 18, after the word "that," I propose to put in the words I suggested, so that the language will then read:

That unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States, the Secretary of War may grant a permit or permits for such dam or dams.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that then the Secretary of the Interior would have to be consulted?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; he would have to be consulted so far as reclamation projects were concerned, and it seems to me he ought to be consulted on that subject. Otherwise he would not have to be consulted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am sorry that I can not agree with my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] in reference to this amendment. It does seem to me that it would practically destroy the effect and purpose of the bill in the Western States. The bill applies only to navigable streams, and solely to navigable streams. The primary purpose of it is in the interest of navigation. Under his amendment on a navigable stream a permit could not be given to build a dam if the Reclamation Service claimed that the site, or a part of it, was needed and necessary for reclamation purposes.

In other words, this amendment accomplishes exactly what the amendment proposing to insert the words "and the Secretary of the Interior" in this section would have accomplished. For the reasons that were given with reference to that amendment I would be opposed to this amendment, and for the further reason that I think it would be unwise from a practical standpoint.

I know what my colleague has in mind with reference to the reclamation of arid lands in our State. I have the same thing in mind in favoring the bill. I believe we will get those lands irrigated if it is possble to do it under the bill far better and much sooner than we could hope to get them irrigated in any other way.

We must take into account the situation with reference to the Reclamation Service. It has not any money to put in any new proposition. It has not any money to put in any dam. It has not any money to reclaim the five or six hundred thousand acres of land, and there is no prospect that it will get any money. There does not seem to be any prospect of our being able to appropriate any money directly to go into the reclamation fund for these propositions. There is not enough money coming into the fund now to carry on existing projects as they ought to be carried on, and they will not be completed for many, many years. So there is no hope for that to be accomplished, even if it were possible for the Reclamation Service to do what my colleague and myself hope may be done at some time.

Then, while the Reclamation Service does put in some power plant as incidental to the reclamation of land and the reclamation project it has not any power to put in locks for navigation purposes, and that is what would have to be done if the purpose of the bill be carried out. We require that those who get a permit to put in a dam in these navigable streams shall put in locks for the purpose of navigation. If the Reclamation Service would propose to put in a dam for the development of power for irrigation purposes what would we do for navigation? There is no provision for it. There is no provision under which they could put it in. We would not appropriate the money to do it.

So it seems to me that the very purpose of the bill in our western country on navigable streams would be either done away with or absolutely at the mercy of the Reclamation Service. Under this amendment the Reclamation Service is made the judge as to whether or not they need the site, or any part of it, and they could block navigation.

I think under the bill if anything is accomplished we will accomplish what my colleague and I both desire. The Secretary of War is required under the terms of the bill before granting a permit to take into account not only navigation but the possibilty of further development for water power and for whatever water power may be used and desired. It would be a very easy matter and a very natural thing for the Reclamation Service in connection with the proposition we have in mind to come to the Secretary of War and say to him, "Now, in granting a permit to put in a dam at this place see to it that a dam sufficient is put in to develop the power for the pumping of water on these thousands of acres of desert land." The Secretary of War would no doubt do that. In that way I hope to get the land irrigated. If a permit is ever granted at the point on the Columbia River we have in mind, that will be taken into account, and power will be developed to pump the water from underground sources or from the river itself to cover the land we want to see covered. I see absolutely no hope through the Reclamation Service to get it done. I would not want to complicate the improvement of navigation with a divided power, rather an absolute veto power placed in the Secretary of the Interior with reference to development at the suggestion of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Knowing the condition of the irrigation fund at the present time and the difficulty of obtaining any increase in that denuded fund, how much does the Senator conceive it would take to build a dam for irrigation purposes across the river at the point the Senators seem to have in their mind? What would be the probable cost?

Mr. JONES. I think it would cost at least several million dollars in order to build a dam and create power sufficient to irrigate the other lands. In addition to that, they would not take into account other possibilities of development.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I appreciate that part of it.

Mr. JONES. They would be absolutely prevented under this bill. We require a broad and comprehensive scheme to be decided upon by the Secretary of War before he grants permits to build the dam. If he does what we are satisfied he will do, he will take into account every possible development by the construction of a proper dam at these different points and cover not only the situation my colleague and I have in mind but any other possible desirable development in connection with such dam. If the Reclamation Service take it up, all they can do is to take it up for reclamation purposes; and all other possible development, except what may be incidental, will be not only delayed but the possibilities of it absolutely done away with, and we would not have the development hereafter.

So it seems to me the amendment of my colleague would be very detrimental from almost every standpoint, from the standpoint of avoiding conflicting authority and from the standpoint of the highest possible development where development ought to be.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator what his views are in regard to this matter? The first section of the bill provides:

That the United States hereby authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined, after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams or diversion structures and accessory works for the development and improvement of navigation and for water power.

That is the part of the first section of the bill that is pertinent to my inquiry. The second section set forth the cases in which the Secretary of War may grant the permit and the conditions upon which he may do so. It is this last section the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] proposes to amend. It is in these words:

That the Secretary of War may grant a permit or permits for such dam or dams and accessory works upon the following conditions—

Then follow the conditions upon which the permit may be granted.

The amendment proposed to be inserted after the word "that" is in these words:

Unless the proposed site or sites therefor shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States.

Now, who is to determine whether the proposed sites are required for the Reclamation Service?

Mr. JONES. The Reclamation Service.

Mr. SHIELDS. And when are they to determine it?

Mr. JONES. There is no time fixed. When they think they need them.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, would not the effect of the amendment be to deprive the Secretary of War of the power to grant a permit for a development when the land to be occupied might at any time in the future be required for the Reclamation Service? Would it not deprive him of the power to exercise the authority which is intended to be conferred upon him by this bill?

Mr. JONES. Wherever they could be of any use for irrigation development, I think so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it not a little stronger than that? Who is to say that the land may or may not be used for the Reclamation Service?

Mr. JONES. The Reclamation Service.

Mr. SHIELDS. Who is to determine it? The language of the amendment is, "unless the proposed site or sites therefor shall be required by and for the Reclamation Service." Is the development of navigation and water power to be forever held up by the probability that the land needed may be at some time required for reclamation purposes?

The Secretary of War in such a case can not grant the permit until this question is settled. Such an amendment would render the law useless and destroy it. It takes the jurisdiction of the whole matter away from the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES. I do not think we ought to have that in at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. I also object to it, because it complicates the jurisdiction of the Departments of War and Interior, and would bring about much confusion.

Mr. JONES. The bill is only intended to relate to the granting of permits for building dams in navigable streams, and the Secretary of War is required to take into account all possibilities of development in connection with such permit and to ascertain that before he grants the permit, and see to it that all possible development is made. It occurs to me that under the terms of the first section the Reclamation Service could not apply for a permit to dam a navigable stream under the bill. I doubt if they could, but if it should be desirable that the Reclamation Service be put upon the basis of the other grantees mentioned in the bill to whom the Secretary of War could grant a permit upon the other conditions of the bill, then I would have no objection to it. I do not think it would be workable under the authority of the Reclamation Service. There is no authority in the reclamation act for the building of locks. They would have to have additional legislation in order to do it.

But that is not what is sought, and that is not what is done by the amendment of my colleague. What his amendment does is to place squarely in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior through the Reclamation Service power to block all development upon all streams, at least in the Western States, where the reclamation act applies. The language is broad enough, I think, to go even as far as was suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. So I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the Senator from Alabama. He rose some time ago.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Senator from Washington did not answer the question quite accurately, and I wish to make it perfectly plain. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington this question: Under the provisions of the amendment, the purpose being, of course, to divert the water from the river for irrigation purposes, if you do not divert the water, of course you get no irrigation. That is conceded. Is it not possible under the provisions of the amendment that the navigability of any of the rivers of the country might be absolutely blocked. In other words, does not the provision of this amendment, if it is put into the bill and carried into effect, divert the water from a navigable river for irrigation purposes, if the Reclamation Service desire it?

Mr. JONES. I hardly think so. I do not think this would permit that to be done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why not?

Mr. JONES. It does not expressly authorize the taking of water out of the stream for irrigation purposes. What the amendment would do would be to block the improvement of rivers for navigation purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly the same. If you block it, you destroy it, do you not?

Mr. JONES. The Senator said it would permit them to take the water out and divert it. For instance, this is what the amendment would do in my State, in my judgment: At Priest Rapids we have no navigation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But you would have under the bill.

Mr. JONES. We would have under the bill; but if the amendment goes in, and the Reclamation people say, "We want the 200 acres of public land that will be overflowed by the building of a proper dam at Priest Rapids for reclamation purposes," then no one would get a permit to put in the dam. The Reclamation Service have not any money; they would not make any development, and so no development would be made. There would not be any water taken out of the stream, but the obstruction to navigation that is there now would continue, and we would not have navigation.

For irrigation purposes, what my colleague contemplates is that there would be power developed by the Reclamation Service at some point that will be used in pumping water to wells in the land that is desired to be irrigated there from an underground source. That is possible, and that would be carried out under this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is very remote.

Mr. JONES. No; I think not. We will get the power; the development will be applied under the bill to do that. But even if it were possible to take water out of the Columbia River by gravity for irrigation purposes, I do not think it is probable, no matter how many acres of land are irrigated, that enough water would be taken out to endanger all possible navigation on that river, because there is an abundance of water. But on other streams, of course, that might be done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not insist that it would have that effect where you have an abundance of water both for navigation and for irrigation. The point I am making and the answer I am endeavoring to get to my question is as to the effect on numerous rivers in the country where there is barely enough water now for navigation properly served.

Mr. JONES. Of course it might seriously affect navigation if not destroy it entirely. Then, of course, there would come a question as to which was more important, the navigation or the irrigation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Of course the Secretary of War, if that proposition is presented to him, would be just as competent to decide it as anyone else on the information he would get. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Alabama, it would seem, has left the Chamber. I was going to ask him if any more power is granted under this amendment to take water out of a stream than already exists under State law.

Mr. JONES. I do not think this gives any power to take water out of a navigable stream or anything of the kind. For these reasons I feel impelled to oppose the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] opens up a wide field of discussion. I stated some days ago that I am friendly to the general purpose of the bill. I did not commit myself as to the bill itself. But such amendments as are being offered by the Senator from Washington are serving to convince me that it is a most unwise thing to press the bill at this time or to consider the water-power question at all except in connection with the general development of a river and the use of a river for every possible purpose.

The Senator from Washington has in contemplation the possible construction of a dam on a river the site of which constitutes a part of a proposed reclamation project, and he provides that the power of the Secretary of War to grant a permit to construct a dam shall not apply to cases where the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States.

Why is not that a reasonable suggestion and a reasonable limitation? The waters of rivers are useful for many purposes. They are useful for navigation, though they are not much used for navigation, because as yet we have not perfected the waterway as we have the railway by every artificial device. The waters are useful for many other purposes and uses which come within the jurisdiction of the States. Water-power development is purely domestic; it is not national; just as irrigation, just as the reclamation of swamp lands are.

Will anyone contend that the use of water for irrigation is not as valuable as the use of water for the development of water power? Is it not just as important to establish homes on our arid plains by supplying those plains with the one thing that is necessary to make them blossom into production as it is to develop electric energy for consumption in the homes?

This indicates that the National Government now has two departments which are concerned in two uses of water—the War Department interested in using water for navigation, to which by this bill is to be added jurisdiction over that use which relates to water power, and the Interior Department interested in the use of water for irrigation. To these two departments you may add the Agricultural Department, which is interested in the control of water for swamp-land reclamation, the antithesis of arid-land reclamation. Then we have the Department of Commerce, with its Coast and Geodetic Survey, with its Bureau of Fisheries, whose development depends upon the proper treatment and condition of our rivers. Going back to the Interior Department, we have the great Geological Survey, engaged in the measurement of waters throughout the United States, the ascertainment of all the scientific data regarding waters which will be of service either in legislation or administration.

An amendment was sought at the very start in the consideration of this bill to add the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of War as the granting power of these permits, and it was beaten. The Senator from Washington says he does not desire the Reclamation Service to be injected in this bill, and so others, upon the prior vote, did not want the Secretary of the Interior, with his powers, injected into the bill. The Senator from Washington says he does not want the War Department complicated with the Reclamation Service. Neither do I want to complicate it, but I want them both coordinated, with these two departments working in cooperation rather than in antagonism when the subject matter which we have under consideration is the same, namely, the full and complete development of the river for every useful purpose.

I agree with the senior Senator from Washington that we should not complicate the Reclamation Service or the Interior Department with the Secretary of War, and we will certainly accomplish that by leaving the amendment out of the bill. I believe that we should coordinate both with the Secretary of War, and we will accomplish that by putting them in the bill.

Mr. President, we are commencing at the wrong end of this proposition, and we are commencing at the wrong end simply because special interests will always be served more rapidly than the general interest. Special interests will always enlist activities that the general interest is slow in enlisting. I indulge in no innuendoes upon this subject. I do not mean to say that there is any improper influence exercised. What I mean to say is that when there is great industry interested in a particular proposal the momentum behind that proposal will carry it into legislation before a measure covering the same subject matter which involves simply the general interest.

Many of us here stand for the general interest, for the public interest, for the interests of the people of to-day and the interests of the people of to-morrow, for the interests of this great Republic; and when we insist upon it that there should be as broad and comprehensive a treatment of this question as the subject itself, we should bring into it the coordination of the various services which relate in any degree to water, all the various departments that have any of the subject matters relating to water under their jurisdiction, and that we should plan and work in a big way, so as to serve every use, and not permit the advancement of a single present use to obstruct another use in the future.

When we insist that the question should be viewed as a big question, involving big sums of money, the employment of big forces, and the utilization of big brains in its conception, we are called visionary, and the men who attach themselves simply to detached portions of a great question here and there are called practical men.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Nevada is now referring to the bill introduced by himself some years ago and now offered as an amendment to this bill, proposing to expend $600,000,000 on such matters?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is quite a large measure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, since the Senator from Tennessee has opened up that question, I shall be very glad to amplify it and to defend the bill.

The Senator's query indicates that one of the visionary elements of the proposal which I have made is that it is to cost $600,000,000, and the Senator stands aghast at the possibility of the people of the United States paying $600,000,000 for anything. Why, Mr. President, we are not paralyzed with doubt and indecision when the great railway authorities tell us that the railway system of the country has cost up to to-day $15,000,000,000; we are not paralyzed when Mr. Hill, the great railway authority, states that within the next five years, I believe, $5,000,000,000 more will have to be spent upon the railway systems of the country. The people of the country have to pay the income upon these extraordinary sums in the shape of rates, which have the force of taxes, for they come out of every man's income. The people support these great enterprises; they pay the interest upon the bonds and the stocks that are issued in order to construct and maintain them; and yet we are not paralyzed when we view Mr. Hill's utterance that within the next five years $5,000,000,000 will be required for the proper development of railway transportation in this country. Why, then, should we be paralyzed when we are confronted by the prospect within 10 years of paying $600,000,000 for the proper development of our water transportation, embracing over 25,000 miles of navigable rivers, coordinating with the railways and with the ocean steamers, which are just as necessary as are the rails and the ocean to a perfect, proper, and complete system of transportation.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to ask the Senator from Nevada whether, in addition to the interest on this investment, we do not also have to pay the profit to those railroads?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course we are paralyzed at the prospect of expending $60,000,000 annually—$600,000,000 within 10 years—in perfecting a system of waterway transportation which will rival our railroad and ocean transportation, and which is absolutely necessary, in coordination with them, to make a complete system of transportation. Then we are paralyzed also, at all events the Senator from Tennessee seems to be paralyzed, when, accompanying that, goes the comforting thought that that $600,000,000 will not only advance transportation upon our rivers, but will develop every possible use of those rivers—the storage and diversion of waters for the reclamation of the arid lands, the control of those waters for the reclamation of swamp lands, the richest in the world, the intermediate development of water power, the conservation of forests, and the storage of water for application, even in the humid regions, for intensive cultivation. The development of our rivers involves every possible form, outside of mining, of conservation of the natural resources of this country. The only way to do it is to do it logically, fully, and comprehensively, serving at the very outset every use to which this water can be put, and so making your plans as that each use will dovetail into every other use in such a way as to produce economy in construction, economy in administration, and the fullest development of all the uses.

Is there anything new in this? Is there anything new in irrigation? It has been practiced for thousands, perhaps millions, of years. Is there anything new in swamp reclamation? Is there anything new in water-power development? Is there anything new in forest growth? Is there anything new in intensive cultivation? Does it require a vivid imagination to evolve a plan for the development of any one of these things? When we propose to coordinate them in some effective way, when we propose in one great scheme to treat them all with a view to economy of cost and economy of administration we are held up as visionary.

Mr. President, it is well known in this body that I am not an obstructer; I do not like to stand in the way of any movement that has the public interest in view. I regard the water-power development as of the highest importance, and I want to see it developed; but I want to see it developed upon proper lines and upon lines that will be harmonious with the development of water for other purposes and uses; and I am rapidly making up my mind that in the future, instead of aiding these detached measures as I have in the past—measures relating to forests, measures relating to water power, measures relating to swamp-land reclamation—the highest duty I can perform, and that other men who think like me can perform, is to obstruct all legislation upon this subject until the Congress of the United States, in its multitudinous duties and interests, has time to inform itself upon the importance of the subject as a whole and to deal with it in that big and comprehensive way which the nature of the subject demands.

I propose to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and other amendments like it, but unless I am convinced that this bill in its final form can work in harmoniously with the other plans which we have for the development of our rivers I am going to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Lane	Poindexter
Beckham	Gronna	Lee, Md.	Pomerene
Brandegee	Harding	Lodge	Ransdell
Broussard	Hardwick	McCumber	Shafroth
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	McLean	Sheppard
Clapp	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Clark, Wyo.	Hughes	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Clarke, Ark.	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Colt	James	Newlands	Smoot
Cummins	Johnson, Me.	Norris	Thompson
Curtis	Jones	Oliver	Tillman
Dillingham	Kenyon	Overman	Walsh
du Pont	Kern	Owen
Gallinger	La Follette	Page

Mr. POMERENE. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of illness.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He is detained on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this very important amendment ought to be considered in the light of the actual facts.

The Reclamation Service does, as a matter of fact, develop power, and, through the means of the power developed, raises water for purposes of irrigation. It develops that power not only by filing on the water of streams and developing electrical energy for the purpose of pumping water, but it actually develops power by means of coal and pumps water for irrigation purposes in that way. The project at Williston, N. Dak., is founded on that principle. The power is developed by means of coal, and water is then pumped. There is a large power plant in connection with the Salt River project, in the State of Arizona.

Mr. President, I should regard it as singularly unfortunate if an opportunity which the Reclamation Service desires to utilize should be turned over to a private corporation. I can not understand how anyone can take the position, when the Government wants to use a power site for governmental purposes, that it should not have that opportunity, but that it should be turned over to a private corporation to develop and utilize.

Furthermore, Mr. President—and I regret very much that the Senator from Tennessee is not here—the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington leaves the ultimate decision of this matter not with the Secretary of the Interior at all, but with the Secretary of War. It does not say that the permit shall not be granted over the objection of the Secretary of the Interior; it simply says that, whenever the site is necessary for the Reclamation Service the permit shall not be granted—not whenever the Reclamation Service puts its veto on it, but when the Secretary of War is convinced that the site is necessary for reclamation purposes, he is commanded not to grant the permit. I do not know how anyone can defend himself in resisting so moderate and so necessary an amendment as that.

Why, Mr. President, the Reclamation Service is advised of the opportunities which are presented in the West for the extension of the irrigation system, to which we are all so attached. The Secretary of War knows nothing about the matter, unless his attention is called to it by the Reclamation Service, and whenever an application is made, under the amendment proposed, it will be necessary for the Secretary of War to inform himself, through the Reclamation Service, as to whether that site is necessary in order to carry out the purposes of the great reclamation act.

That the Reclamation Service has the power to develop a power site as part and parcel of a recamation project, I entertain the idea no one can seriously dispute, and that it is wise wherever a water-power development is necessary to carry out that purpose that it should be devoted to that purpose probably can not be disputed, either. There is a dread, as you will observe, even to have the Secretary of the Interior introduced in this matter in an advisory capacity, but the purpose is to turn the whole thing over to the Secretary of War, with the suggestion, even, that he should not listen to any views which the Reclamation Service might have to express concerning the wisdom of utilizing the opportunity for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the reclamation act.

The amendment does not say, by any means, that the permit shall not be granted if the Reclamation Service shall object or if the Secretary of the Interior shall object; it simply provides that the Secretary of War shall determine whether the project is necessary in connection with the work of the Reclamation Service; and if so, to withhold the permit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word before the vote is taken. The Senator from Montana seems to think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington would still leave the discretion in the Secretary of War; but I want to call his attention to the wording of the amendment. The amendment is to be inserted after the word "That," in line 18, section 2, page 3. The first part of that section now reads:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War may grant a permit or permits for such dam or dams and accessory works upon the following conditions—

After the word "That," it is proposed by the Senator from Washington that there be inserted this language:

Unless the proposed site or sites thereof shall be required by or for the Reclamation Service of the United States.

Who is to determine that? The Reclamation Service. Whenever they make their filing, that is all that is necessary to be done; and, consequently, it takes away the power of the Secretary of War to determine what is best for the Government in connection with the matter.

Mr. President, this measure, of course, applies only to navigable streams, and I am satisfied that the Senator from Montana would resist any effort in what is called the Ferris water-power bill to lodge any jurisdiction or power whatever in the Secretary of War to meddle in the matters provided for in that bill. It seems to me to be plain and clear that if you are going to have two Secretaries concerned in this matter you are going to have conflicts of jurisdiction and conflict in determining the questions involved.

Now, I wish to call attention to this fact: The Reclamation Service has filed on numerous sites for irrigation or reclamation projects in the United States; they have almost any number of them; but they are not doing anything with them, except in a few instances. In my State, in 14 years, there have been only two, and they are not entirely completed, one of them not being in operation to the full extent now. Not only that, but there are any number of sites which have been filed upon by the Reclamation Service, and which are held by them, so that they can not be improved; and when they will ever be improved by the National Government in connection with a reclamation project it is impossible to tell. The reclamation fund is not large; it is not increasing; and if you are going to rely upon those projects being undertaken by the National Government, you will find that it will be many and many a year before even a majority of them will be completed.

Mr. President, this proposition seems to me so plain that I can not understand why people have thrown what, it seems to me, will be obstructions in its path which would produce almost an annihilation of the work.

The Senator from Washington referred to the fact that I had been opposing the imposition of burdens upon corporations which might undertake development work under this bill. In the first place, Mr. President, the proposed power companies, in order to undertake a project at all, must agree to install, free of charge, the necessary navigation works for the United States. That is going to cost $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 in a given project. Is it possible that you can expect any company to undertake development work under this bill if you require them to put up such expensive works and in addition burden them with every restriction in the wide world which can be conceived of?

In connection with the valuation of the land we have voted down several propositions; but when we come to ascertain just what valuation is provided in this bill we find that the permittee shall be paid for the value of the property, not including anything granted by the permit. It seems to me that that is a sufficient curb upon corporations which might exercise privileges under this bill as to charging exorbitant prices.

As to this proposal to have two Secretaries determine whether a certain project shall be used for irrigation or shall be used for navigation, I think that injects an element into this bill which it was not intended to present here. This is not an irrigation bill; this is a bill which relates to the interests of navigation; but if the Secretary of the Interior were to call to the attention of the Secretary of War the fact that a given site was more important for irrigation than for navigation, then, I have no doubt, the Secretary of War, guided by the best interests of the country, would yield to that suggestion; but to say that the Reclamation Service, by reason of the filings it may have made, shall absolutely have the right of determination in connection with a power site and to divest the Secretary of War of that right, it seems to me, is absurd. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Colorado whether he would be willing to have the Secretary of the Interior united with the Secretary of War in the granting of these permits?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, we voted on that, and the Senate voted two to one against putting this authority in two departments, because there will be conflicts. Would anybody want to insert in the Ferris bill a provision that the Secretary of War should have jurisdiction? Nobody would think of such a proposition as that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would not. I do not think it ought to be done. I think these ought to be distinct. You might as well say that the engineers of the War Department and the engineers of the Interior Department should determine these matters. You would have interminable conflict if that were done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I think so. Now, let me say to the Senator that the very fact that the Senator refuses to include the Secretary of the Interior with the Secretary of War in this council that is to determine a most important matter—namely, the grant of this permit or license—has necessitated the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, which proposes to confine the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War to those parts of the river that are properly under his jurisdiction and to those uses that are under his jurisdiction, without permitting him to exercise his power in such a way as to oust the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, which he has under the irrigation acts.

The construction of dams is an essential part of almost every irrigation project. The development of water power in connection with those dams which are primarily intended for the diversion of flood waters is also most important. It is of the highest importance that these works should be put to every beneficial use, in order that the cost for a single beneficial use may not be prohibitive; and thus, by distributing the cost over various uses, you bring that cost within the reasonable requirements of the situation.

For purposes of reclamation of arid lands, the Secretary of the Interior has just as much jurisdiction as the Secretary of War has over rivers for navigation or for the development of water power. Thus far the Secretary of War has been given jurisdiction only over those phases of river development that relate to navigation. Now, we are adding to that jurisdiction over the uses that relate to water power. What do we find then? That we have given two Secretaries jurisdiction over different uses of water—one for the development of water power, the other for the development of irrigation; and yet the development of irrigation in many cases includes the development of water power and must include it.

What do you say under this bill? That in such a case as that the Secretary of War can exercise that power without consulting the Secretary of the Interior; or, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, you put the Secretary of the Interior in the position of a suppliant, going to the Secretary of War and humbly presenting the considerations which suggest themselves to him, but without the least power to check the control and the action of the Secretary of War.

I say that is illogical. We have in view the full development of these rivers for every useful purpose, and we are approaching that matter piecemeal and in a most disorderly and disjointed way. We should not have contradictory jurisdictions. Wherever there are officials that have a part of the jurisdiction over the same subject matter, or where their jurisdictions are likely to conflict, the only thing to do is to bring those jurisdictions into cooperation by organizing them into one body.

What Secretaries have jurisdiction over matters relating to water? The Secretary of War, first in history, and perhaps formerly first in importance, has control over navigation. His powers have never yet been exercised scientifically or efficiently, and our rivers are as disjointed as they ever were—just as inefficient as a railway system with a mile of rail out every 10 miles and without station houses or sidetracks. We propose to turn over to this department, which has never yet done anything efficient regarding our rivers, and has never planned our rivers comprehensively or fully, practically the control of every other use of the water; and we are going to compel such departments as the Interior Department to approach the War Department on its bended knees and ask consideration for its suggestions with reference to matters that are placed under its jurisdiction.

If there ever was a case for the application of that much-abused term "coordination," this is the case. If you say that if you give it to two only they may differ, the answer to that is, have a third, and then there will be a casting vote. Who should be the third? Why, obviously either the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Commerce, because each of them has jurisdiction over certain phases of the water question. The Agricultural Department has jurisdiction over the development of our forests as reservoirs of moisture, over drainage with a view to reclaiming swamp lands, over the use of water for intensive cultivation, and the Department of Commerce has jurisdiction by reason of its Bureau of Fisheries, where the development of our rivers also involves the promotion of the fisheries, and also through the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which has jurisdiction over certain phases of the water question.

It is easy enough to find departments that can coordinate in this respect, and it is a great deal better to have a composite judgment than to have the judgment of a single man, who may be either a wise man or a fool, according to conditions. I would rather trust to the composite judgment of a board of three than the judgment of one man, however high his position, in a matter involving judgment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will look at the amendment, he will find that this is not a proposition to coordinate. It is not a proposition that these men shall agree to consult with each other. It is a proposition that divests the Secretary of War of any power to touch anything that the Reclamation Service has set aside, and consequently the Secretary of War has got to go down on his knees if he proposes to undertake any enterprise in behalf of navigation, to what? Not even to the Secretary, but to the Reclamation Service.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My answer to that is that we offered the Senator from Colorado, and those who support this bill, coordination. We offered to put in this bill the Secretary of the Interior side by side with the Secretary of War in the exercise of this power, and that was rejected. Now we propose, if we can, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to block the Secretary of War where the proposal involves an irrigation project, upon the assumption that when the Interior Department has planned an irrigation project it has to that extent gained jurisdiction over the use of the river for that purpose, and we will not permit the Secretary of War to interfere with it any more than we will permit the Secretary of the Interior to interfere with the Secretary of War with reference to a matter that has been put within his jurisdiction. We are willing that these departments shall coordinate, and we will cooperate with the Senator from Colorado in providing for that; but unless he provides for that, we shall insist that the Secretary of War shall not be permitted to invade the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior in a matter of such high importance to the arid and semiarid regions.

Therefore I propose to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had hoped that those in charge of this bill would be willing to accept some of these amendments that tend to protect the public interest. To my mind, this is one that should appeal to that sentiment very strongly. It seems to me more than a possible conflict between the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior—much more than a conflict of jurisdictions. This bill proposes practically to give away to private corporations valuable rights and privileges for money making. The committee is in the attitude of refusing even to except from those free gifts irrigation projects which are not private projects, but which are public enterprises, carried on for the public use and the development of the public domain. It seems to me that that is a great mistake, and that, if there is any amendment which should appeal to the committee in the direction of protecting the public interest, this is one.

Here is a great irrigation enterprise which has been carried on now for 20 years, I think. The Senator from Nevada can correct me, as he was one of the authors—perhaps the author—of the measure in the House of Representatives.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Since 1902.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Since 1902 irrigation has been carried on as a public enterprise. Under it, hundreds of thousands of acres of arid lands have been converted into garden spots, and the public domain has been used for the development of these new empires in the West. Now the Senator stands here proposing to refuse to the responsible head of the department which has the supervision of these irrigation projects the right to protest and interfere if one of them is to be destroyed practically in the interest of a private concern, using a water power which comes as a practically free gift from the Government.

This is something more than a mere conflict of jurisdictions. It is a proposition to permit private projects, operated for profit, to interfere with a great public enterprise carried on for the public good and the development of the public domain.

What possible harm can come from permitting the Secretary of the Interior, who is really the man who has the deciding voice in the Reclamation Service, to reserve from the operations of this bill such lands and such waters as he deems necessary for these public uses? There are plenty of rivers, plenty of streams, that these private concerns can receive and develop for their private profit.

To my mind it would be a great mistake if the Senate should vote to reject the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator says this is a free gift from the Government to a company. He overlooks the fact which I stated just a little while ago, that the free gift is from the company to the Government in erecting the works that are necessary to make this improvement of the river. It has to pay for those works out of its own money. This condition arises from the fact that the Government has not enough money to make all the river and harbor improvements that are necessary, and it does not make the appropriations, and consequently it does not get the rivers improved. Here is a proposition to build these improvements for the Government, and yet the Senator talks about a free gift from the Government!

Besides that, the bill provides that the rates of these companies shall be regulated by the public-utility commissions of the States, and they are going to safeguard the people of the States as against high rates. To say that this is a free gift on the part of the Government, when they are paying a million or two million dollars in order to give the Government facilities for improving the rivers, seems to me to be absurd.

Mr. President, I think we ought to have a vote on this amendment, and I ask for a vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, since the Senator from Colorado has spoken on the amendment at least four times to my knowledge, I do not see why he insists on a vote just as he takes his seat.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Washington is always getting up and talking. I do not talk more than a minute or two. The Senator from Washington has been on his feet quite a while.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But I have not had an opportunity to say anything. [Laughter.]

I just wanted to remark that there is not any conflict of authority involved in this amendment that need be any obstacle to a consideration of the amendment on its merits. If the Senator from Colorado thinks it is important that the Secretary of War shall determine this matter, that can be very easily fixed in the bill, if the Senate agreed with him on it. I do not know that I should have any very great objection to that. It seems to me that in reclamation matters the Secretary of the Interior is the proper one to determine them; but there is no reason why, upon that question, this amendment should be either adopted or rejected, because that is a matter which can be fixed so as to leave no doubt whatever about it.

It has been urged that there is no use in reserving power sites for the use of the Reclamation Service of the Government, because there is no money in the reclamation fund. That is equivalent to saying that we have arrived at a point where the Reclamation Service has come to the end of its usefulness. It is equivalent to saying that we ought not to allow it to take power sites, because it has nothing further to do, and can not do anything further. I hope that is not the case. I hope that for a great many years the Reclamation Service, which has only gotten fairly started in the performance of the great functions for which it was organized, will continue to develop the arid and unsettled lands of the West so as to make them available for the homes of millions of our citizens.

A great many of these projects are being considered by the Reclamation Service at the present time. To lay down the proposition—as would be the effect of shutting them off from the necessary available public resources—that there could be nothing further done, that they were to cease to exercise their function, that public irrigation was to come to an end, that there were no more funds for their use, it seems to me would cause a general shock throughout the country and particularly throughout the West, which has been particularly benefited by the Reclamation Service.

There will be money in the reclamation fund. All of the money which the Reclamation Service has expended will eventually come back to it. Those funds have been slower in coming back than was anticipated, but they are coming back.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment. As these lands come into bearing, as they will come into bearing, and become profitable, and begin to make returns, and the settlers upon them are able to pay the dues to the Government for the water and for the land, the reclamation fund will be replenished. Furthermore, even though it were not replenished in that way, the principle being established and having been accepted throughout the country as one of the most important Government functions that has been established in this generation, if one-half of the energy were put into an effort to replenish the reclamation fund, to secure the necessary appropriations to enable it to carry on its work, that has been put into the passage of bills to enable private companies to acquire franchises on the public domain there would be no dearth of funds.

I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me also to observe that the reclamation fund now amounts to over $80,000,000; that it is a revolving fund, being constantly replenished by the sale of water rights, and the proceeds being used in the extension of old projects or the inauguration of new ones; and that, in addition to that, the river-regulation bill which I have been urging, in its appropriation of $60,000,000 annually for 10 years, includes a very considerable sum—I think about $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 annually—to be expended in that portion of the development of our rivers which relates to the reclamation of arid lands?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Nevada a question before he takes his seat. The bill to which he refers is a very meritorious measure, comprehensive in its character; but I should like to ask the Senator if he expects soon to get favorable action upon that bill by Congress?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can state that a departmental committee, consisting of four Secretaries, has been in consultation upon that bill; that they favor its general framework; that whilst they are not disposed to make any recommendation as to the sum to be appropriated, leaving that to Congress, yet that they are prepared to recommend to the President that he recommend to Congress legislation upon the general line of cooperation of services and departments and cooperation of the Nation with the States contemplated by that bill. I will state, further, that that bill has been indorsed by about 10 State legislatures, I think, and by numerous waterway associations, and so forth, throughout the country.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My purpose in asking the question arose from the fact that, notwithstanding all the funds to which the Senator refers, the reclamation fund is now very seriously embarrassed, and I hoped that the Senator could give us some information that would lead us to believe that it would soon be replenished in the manner of which he has spoken.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; that is one of the purposes of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator how much is in the reclamation fund at the present time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Over $80,000,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator mean in money?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; the money has been expended.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but how much cash is there for the purpose of construction right now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is available only about five or six million dollars annually.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not believe there is that amount available. I believe there is a deficit there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not apprehend that the Senator from Colorado and others who are urging this argument are going to take the position that the usefulness of the Reclamation Service of the Government has come to an end. Undoubtedly the Reclamation Service will continue, and the rapidity with which it will accomplish the object of developing reclamation projects will depend upon the activity of its friends in securing funds for it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President; the act provides that only a certain proportion of the proceeds of the sale of public lands shall go into that fund, and that, of course, is going to diminish as we get rid of our public lands. Then, again, the rotary fund of which the Senator speaks is paid in only at the rate of 5 per cent a year; that is all. Consequently, if the fund is low now, it is going to be many years before many other projects can be undertaken. We have a number of sites in our State, but only two have been undertaken. One has been completed, while the other is still in course of construction, and has been for 6 or 7 years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just one word——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that if the Senator will examine the river-regulation bill to which I have referred he will find that irrigation will be very largely reinforced, for one of the purposes of the bill is not only to promote navigation and water-power development, etc., but to promote the reclamation of arid lands. His State will be one of the States largely benefited.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the reclamation fund enlarged; I think it is a good thing; but we have got to look at facts as they are. The reclamation fund is not large—that is, the cash available—and can not be large, under the act as it now exists.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not going to be of any benefit to the impoverished funds of the Reclamation Service to compel it to purchase its power from a private company—and I may say from a company that is in the grasp of a monopoly—in preference to getting it at cost under its own development. It is a curious argument that because a service of the Government is poor you must make its operation more expensive. I propose to make it cheaper by giving it its power at cost, by the simple process of retaining and developing the natural resources which the Government already owns.

It is said by Senators that their object is the same as mine in the matter of encouraging the development of irrigation projects, so far as this bill affects them; but their plan is that we shall turn the power sites over to private companies, under all the circumstances which have been disclosed in this debate as to the trust control of those private water-power companies, and then that we shall buy the power back from them again. There is no way in which we can compel them to furnish the Government power unless we proceed to condemn it, with the consequential expense of the proceedings, and the high prices which always have to be paid in condemnation suits. The Government will be at the mercy of the private company. The alternative, as I have stated before, is that we will remain masters of the situation which the Government now occupies in that regard.

The Senator from Colorado continues to revert to the argument that in some way this is going to prevent the improvement of a stream for navigation. Mr. President, if you develop power in a navigable stream and put that power on a copper wire and convey it some miles distant to a tract of dry land and attach it there to a pump which lifts water from a well, how is that going to injure navigation in the stream?

Furthermore, Mr. President, it has been argued with a great deal of vehemence and very many times in this debate, and by no one more than by the Senator from Colorado, that the Government has no control over these waters; that they are subject to State laws. How, then, putting in a provision in this act giving a preferential right, which is all that it does, for the Reclamation Service to use some of the sites of these plants for the purpose of developing power is going to affect one way or the other taking water out of the stream is more than I can reconcile with the argument of the Senator from Colorado.

It is also argued that without this amendment the Secretary of War undoubtedly would go to the Secretary of the Interior and inquire whether or not a certain site was needed by the Secretary of the Interior for the Reclamation Service, and that if the Secretary of the Interior informed the Secretary of War that it was, the Secretary of War would not grant a permit under this act.

If that is the case, what objection can the opponents of this amendment have to fixing it in the law? If the power already exists, it will have the same effect, they fear, as it would be if it was declared in a specific amendment and put into the act. Of course, it does not exist unless you write it into the law. As the bill is framed now the Secretary of War will be required to grant an exclusive permit for a water-power site to any applicant who is qualified under the definition of the bill, and that definition excludes the Reclamation Service. So the situation declared by the Senator from Colorado does not exist at all. If it did, there would be no harm in the amendment, from his standpoint; and, if it does not, the amendment is absolutely essential to save for the Government these power sites. The sum and substance of it is that it simply gives a preferential right to the Reclamation Service of the Government for power sites.

It has been argued against the amendment that there is no time fixed within which the Reclamation Service would have to act. I assume it will act at once. It will act in such time as the Secretary of War, in the rules which he will be compelled to make for the administration of this law, will fix. But if the law does not authorize the Secretary of War to fix a definite time in which the Reclamation Service must declare its purpose to retain or not to retain the power sites, there is no objection to fixing a time in the bill. There would be no difficulty about that. If the amendment is adopted, the time can be specified and the Reclamation Service required to act within that time. That is an immaterial objection. No one will oppose such a change in the form of the amendment or such an addition to it.
